Jordan seeks to free detainees in Iraq

AMMAN (R) — Jordan is seeking the release of up to 700 Jordanian detainees held in Iraqi jails, officials and diplomats said on Monday. Most of the prisoners have not been convicted by courts. They are being held for reasons including leaving Iraq with documents, considered by Baghdad as smuggling. Officials said the detainees plight was raised in talks with Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz, Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed Sahaf and Interior Minister Warban Al Hassan, half brother of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. "We have been raising the issue of these detainees with Iraq for months as we believe most of them have been held for unfair reasons," said a Jordanian government official. "We finally got a promise from Iraq that they would study the files of all detainees and in light of that, they would decide what measures to take." Arab diplomats said Jordan's ambassador in Iraq visited the detainees recently after trying for months, an indication Baghdad might show some flexibility. "Their living conditions are not any better from those of ordinary Iraqis suffering under sanctions and poverty," said one diplomat familiar with conditions inside Iraqi jails.

Israel, PLO, Jordan and Egypt to meet

CAIRO (AFP) — Israel, Jordan and the Palestinians will meet with Egypt here on Tuesday in multilateral talks on proposals for a regional business council, an Egyptian Foreign Ministry official said. The four are gathering as part of the trade commission of the Regional Economic Development Working Group (REDWG) launched along with Arab-Israeli talks at the October 1991 Madrid peace conference. Deputy Assistant Foreign Minister Ru'uf Saad told AFP on Monday. "The REDWG negotiations will explore the most appropriate mechanisms to establish the regional council of the businessmen recommended by the Casablanca summit" on economic development in last October and November," Mr. Saad said.

Egypt seeks funds held in Iraq

CAIRO (AFP) — An Egyptian official will go to Geneva Tuesday in a bid to secure nearly $500 million owed to thousands of Egyptian workers which has been held in Iraq since the 1991 Gulf war. Tarek Aziz, a senior Foreign Ministry official, will attend a meeting of a U.N. arbitration committee Wednesday and Thursday, authorities said here. Egypt and Iraq signed an accord in 1989 to regulate transfers of Egyptians' earnings. It set a ceiling of $15 million every 10 days. However, Iraqi banks halted the transfers during the August 1990-February 1991 Gulf crisis.

Europeans join Libyan protest

RIPOLI (R) — European officials joined Libyans on Monday in front of the U.N. office in Tripoli to protest against a 1986 U.S. raid on Libya. "We are 250 people from Italy but also from France, Spain, Malta, Britain, Portugal, Germany and Belgium to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the U.S. bombing," said Nino Pasti, spokesman for the Italian peace organization Nino Pasti International Foundation. "It is a shame for the U.N. to come an instrument of aggression from a superpower." Mr. Pasti told Reuters, referring to the U.N. Security Council's refusal to discuss U.S. raid.

Hamas and PLO meet on violence

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM (Agencies) — The Palestinian National Authority (PNA) and its Hamas rivals are meeting secretly to reach an accord to prevent anti-Israeli attacks that are holding up peace moves, Hamas and Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) officials said on Monday.

They said the two sides met on Sunday. One PLO official said the meeting was "very positive." The talks were hosted by PNA member Zakaria Al Agha.

"There was understanding and readiness from all sides to work for the interests of the Palestinian people," Mr. Agha said when asked whether Hamas had responded to calls to halt armed attacks.

Hamas leader says Abu Musab told Reuters: "Yesterday's meeting was within the framework of cooling tensions. It is wrong to boycott."

He declined to say whether Hamas agreed to suspend attacks from Palestinian self-rule areas.

PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, who heads the PNA, vowed to get tough with Hamas and Islamic Jihad — both militant groups opposed to his peace deal with Israel — after their suicide bombings in self-ruled Gaza last week killed eight Jews.

Mr. Arafat's security forces arrested hundreds and sentenced five members of the groups in a Gaza military court.

On Sunday Mr. Arafat called for a national dialogue but demanded the two groups limit themselves to peaceful means in opposing the 1993 peace deal which gave Palestinians self-rule in Gaza and in the West Bank towns of Jericho.

Mr. Arafat told a crowd of 20,000 at Gaza City's Yarmouk soccer stadium that the militants' attacks on Israelis only undermine the Palestinians' own goals.

"I am telling my brothers yes to national dialogue, but only on the basis of their commitment to what the PLO signed," he said.

Mr. Arafat said the militants handed the Israelis a pretext for the delays.

"There is a movement in Israel that wants to delay and kill the agreement and the Palestinian dream and I must say that there are people here that are giving the Israelis the chance to use security as their excuse," Mr. Arafat said.

"Israel is delaying the whole thing under many pretexts and the most dangerous one is that of their security. Each time they say security, security, security," Mr. Arafat said.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said Sunday that Mr. Arafat's recent steps against the militants do not satisfy Israel.

"The Palestinians have the ability to do more and we demand this," Mr. Rabin told Israel Television. "We will judge them by this."

The gathering at Yarmouk stadium marked the seventh anniversary of the death of Mr. Arafat's PLO second-in-command Khalil Wazir, better known as Abu Jihad. His shooting death at his home in Tunis was widely blamed on Israeli commandos, but Israel has never confirmed any involvement.

Israel and the PLO say they hope to reach a deal by July 1 on extending self-rule to other parts of the West Bank. Israel has made such an agreement contingent on Mr. Arafat doing more to stop Hamas and Islamic Jihad attacks.

"The authority demands from Hamas respect of the PLO-Israeli accord. It does not ask them to accept it, nor to be committed to it, but to refrain from carrying out attacks from and inside self-rule areas," one PLO official said.

"They can oppose as much as they want," he said.

"I condemn it. We want peace and security for both sides. We want a ceasefire. We demand that Israel respect human rights and human life," Dr. Shaath said.

People must be judged if they have done something reprehensible. It is intolerable to kill them in cold blood.

"It has to stop immediately, particularly in Hebron, the town which still bears the scars of the mosque massacre carried out by Goldstein."

Jewish settler Baruch Goldstein killed at least 30 Muslims in the occupied West Bank town of Hebron in February 1994.

Troops maintained a strict curfew on Palestinians in Hebron on Monday fearing revenge attacks over the killing.

The army deployed reinforcements, set up more roadblocks and made searches and identity checks, a day after undercover agents shot dead the three.

PNA accuses Israelis of cold-blooded killing in Hebron

GAZA CITY (Agencies) — The Palestine National Authority (PNA) charged Monday that the Israeli army had murdered three Palestinians in cold blood and called for a ceasefire.

"I am shocked by this tragedy," said Nabil Shaath, the chief Palestinian peace negotiator and minister for international cooperation.

"Three martyrs were assassinated in Hebron. It was a cold-blooded killing. I condemn it. We want peace and security for both sides. We want a ceasefire. We demand that Israel respect human rights and human life," Dr. Shaath said.

Baghdad demands release of assets

NICOSIA (Agencies) — Iraq's foreign minister says that Iraqi assets worth $4 billion, frozen after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, should be released so that Baghdad can buy food and medicine for the country's 20 million long-suffering people.

In an interview with the state-run Baghdad Radio broadcast Sunday night, Mohammad Saad Al Sahaf said that Iraq insists that U.N. trade sanctions imposed in 1990 should also be lifted.

He reiterated Baghdad's rejection of a U.N. Security Council offer to allow Iraq to sell oil worth $4 billion a year for humanitarian purposes.

The council unanimously approved that offer, proposed by the United States and Britain, on April 14.

Mr. Sahaf declared: "According to the logic that produced the resolution, they should now unfreeze the Iraqi assets if there is a humanitarian action framework. Iraq has more than $4 billion frozen in their banks."

"We will not deviate. The Americans, with all their malice, will not be able to force Iraq, and those who sympathise with it, to deviate from the basic and primary demand," he said.

Before the Security Council voted, Iraqi Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz said Baghdad might reconsider the proposed offer if unspecified amendments were made.

But it is unlikely that the Security Council is prepared to make any further concessions to Baghdad following its rejection of the offer of limited oil sales to purchase food and medicine.

Russia and France, which have been campaigning for the U.N. embargo to be lifted, voted for the oil sales offer and Baghdad's rejection has left them with little room for manoeuvre.

There is unlikely to be any progress towards easing the sanctions until Baghdad gets a clean bill of health from Rolf Ekeus, chief of the U.N. Special Commission responsible for overseeing the destruction of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. Ekeus reported to the Security Council April 10 that Iraq's nuclear, missile and chemical weapons programme have been essentially eliminated, but stressed that Iraq may still be trying to produce biological weapons.

"The Iraqi people and all boost people in the Arab World and elsewhere reject the new resolution which only serves U.S. interests and deprives the Iraqis of their legitimate right to export their own oil," said Vice-President Taha Yassin Ramadan, quoted by the official Iraqi News Agency.

If Iraq accepted U.N. Resolution 986, "the United States and its allies would have the chance to achieve their hostile objectives, including seizure of Iraq's oil riches," he said.

Mr. Ramadan said the resolution was "designed by the United States to mislead international opinion, as usual."

"It does not secure the essential needs of the Iraqi people, implies a division of the country and represents flagrant interference in Iraq's internal affairs," he said.

Parliamentary Speaker Saadi Mubdi Saleh, chairing a meeting of parliamentary committees to study the resolution Sunday, said it set "a serious precedent in international relations."

The resolution was "an attack on Iraq's sovereignty, threatening the unity of its people and their security."

Earlier state television said the cabinet, chaired by President Saddam Hussein, agreed unanimously to "reject categorically the resolution because it dangerously strikes a blow at Iraq's sovereignty."

Oil prices shot back up towards eight-month highs on Monday after Iraq rejected the United Nations resolution.

U.S., China clash over nuclear deal with Iran

NEW YORK (Agencies) — U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Chinese Foreign Minister Qian Qichen clashed on Monday over a reported Chinese nuclear deal with Iran.

Mr. Christopher told reporters before talks with Mr. Qian that he would be telling the minister nuclear cooperation with Tehran was "too dangerous to justify."

But Mr. Qian said nothing Beijing was doing conflicted with international law.

"We respect the views of the United States," Mr. Qian said. "But what we are doing is consistent with international practice."

Mr. Christopher and Mr. Qian were meeting on the fringes of a U.N. conference on the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) that was due to open later on Monday.

Neither man referred to a specific Chinese deal with Iran, but the Washington Post reported on Monday that China was planning to build two 300-megawatt pressurised water reactors in Iran and transfer associated know-how.

"Our position is one that Iran is... simply too dangerous with its intentions and its motives and its designs to justify nuclear cooperation of an allegedly peaceful character," Mr. Christopher said.

"I hope to have an opportunity to talk further with the (Chinese) minister on this subject."

But Mr. Qian, standing next to Mr. Christopher, said through an interpreter that there was no international law or agreement against peaceful nuclear cooperation with other countries. "We respect the view of the United States but what we (have) done is consistent with the international practice," he said.

According to the Post, the Sino-Iranian agreement, which is still being negotiated, could be similar to that signed in January between Russia and Iran and denounced by the U.S. government.

The agreement concerns the construction of two 300 megawatt reactors in Iran and the transfer of Chinese technology.

"China is technically not doing anything that conflicts with the NPT and its international obligations. But we have the same kind of concern... (and) we think it would be in their best self-interest to cancel further negotiations," a senior official was quoted as saying.

China maintains that it is only taking part in peaceful cooperation with Iran, the paper said.

It added that Chinese technicians had also given Iran advice on the extraction of uranium and discussed technological aid to help Iran develop its own nuclear fuels.

The newspaper stated that under the terms of the Sino-Iranian agreement being negotiated the reactors and fuel would be subject to international inspection.

But Washington is concerned because any increase in Iran's nuclear capacity could facilitate secret efforts in Tehran to develop nuclear weapons.

Given its vast oil reserves it was difficult for Iran to justify a need for nuclear energy, officials told the Post.

A senior official said the Chinese response to Mr. Christopher's objections would influence Washington's decision on the implementation of an agreement on nuclear cooperation recently signed in Beijing by U.S. Energy Secretary Hazel O'Leary.

New generation of Palestinians train as 'human bombs'

AIN HELWEH, Lebanon (AFP) — Forty young Palestinians in Lebanon's largest refugee camp are training to become "human bombs" as Islamic militants prepare a new generation of martyrs to blow up Israeli targets.

The "lion cubs" as they are called, some as young as 14 and mostly orphans, undergo rigorous weapons training using live ammunition in Ain Helweh camp to turn them into future suicide bombers.

"I am not scared of dying, I want to free Palestine," said one young recruit, 15-year-old Ibrahim Khaid.

Their trainer, Munir Maqad, is a recent but committed convert to the militant fight against Israel. A dissident from Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction, Colonel Maqad now controls the camp, the biggest in Lebanon.

He believes Palestinian youngsters, who once were content to throw stones in the seven-year intifada against Israeli occupation, launched in 1987, have moved on to more bloody methods.

"We are preparing human bombs because it is the only language the enemy understands," the bearded 37-year-old also known as Abu Hassan told AFP.

"The Israelis want to shatter the Palestinian dream, but we are retaliating by training a new generation of fighters."

A wave of suicide bombings has terrorised Israel in the past year when 56 Israelis died in attacks inside the Jewish state, according to police figures.

Abu Hassan fired between the legs of his young recruits to test their nerve. Dressed in combat fatigues with helmets covering their shaved heads, they crawled across the sandy ground with Kalashnikov rifles in their hands.

"For these youths the Palestinian revolution began on September 13, 1993," the day Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles on autonomy in Washington, Abu Hassan said.

"We will continue to raise them and turn them into martyrs until the end of the Israeli occupation."

6 UNIFIL officers removed

TYRE (Agencies) — Six U.N. officers have been transferred after causing an uproar by attending Israeli army exercises in the occupied sector of South Lebanon without permission, U.N. sources said Monday.

General Stanislaw Wozniak, commander of the 5,000-strong U.N. Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL), ordered the disciplinary action apparently to defuse the controversy after guerrilla leaders and politicians denounced the officers' presence at the manoeuvres as tantamount to recognition of Israel's occupation of the border enclave.

Officials with the U.N. peacekeeping force say that two officers from the Norwegian battalion and four from another U.N. formation, observer Group Lebanon, attended the exercises by Israeli troops and their militia allies of the South Lebanon Army (SLA) last Tuesday on their own initiative.

"As a result of their unauthorised attendance, the force commander took immediate action, transferring from the south those who were involved," one U.N. source said Monday.

The sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, declined to say whether the officers were sent home or to other U.N. missions.

The sources said the four observer force officers were from Denmark, Finland, Austria and the Netherlands.

Defence Minister Mohsen Dalloul has expressed fears that the U.N. officers' attendance last week of the wargames at Majidiyyeh village "was a sign of complete and blind bias which breaches the mission of those officers."

"This matter must be followed up and the situation of the United Nations forces and its mission should be reconsidered," Mr. Dalloul said on Sunday.

UNIFIL was deployed in South Lebanon in 1978 after a 91-day Israeli invasion. The troops from nine nations police a U.N. zone that overlaps the Israeli-occupied enclave.

Observer Group Lebanon's mission is to monitor the 1948 armistice agreement between Lebanon and Israel.

Dig halted at 'tomb of Alexander'

CAIRO (AFP) — An archaeological team has suspended work for the summer at a site in the Siwa oasis in Egypt's western desert claimed to be the lost tomb of Alexander the Great.

The head of Egypt's Supreme Council for Antiquities, Abdul Halim Nureddin, told AFP Sunday the dig "has not been abandoned — it will continue in October."

He said the desert site, 750 kilometres west of Cairo, was becoming very hot.

"We have to assess all the material discovered and see the results of electromagnetic studies" of the site, being analysed in Canada, Mr. Nureddin said without giving further details.

The head of the team, Liana Souvatzis, returned to Greece on Friday.

Mr. Nureddin sparked a controversy in January when he announced that the largely Greek team had discovered the tomb of the Macedonian conqueror, long thought to have been buried in the Mediterranean port city of Alexandria.

Ms. Souvatzis has vowed to find the remains of the defied king, despite a storm of criticism from other archaeologists and Greek nationalists.

Meanwhile, the Egyptian government has revived a controversial plan to build a road tunnel at the site of the pyramids of Giza, despite earlier agreeing to move the route away from the historic site, officials said.

Reconstruction Minister Mohammad Ibrahim Suleiman presented President Hosni Mubarak with a proposal Saturday for a tunnel under the pyramids plateau, the minister's spokesman Hisham Amin told AFP.

He said the exact location of the road tunnel, forming part of an almost completed motorway encircling Cairo, would be determined in later studies.

The pyramids site is the only one of seven wonders of the ancient world still in existence.

In December the U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO) rejected an earlier tunnel proposal to replace the motorway passing 2.5 kilometres south of the pyramids, which it said endangered the monuments.

UNESCO threatened to remove the pyramids from its World Heritage list if the danger is not eliminated.

Hizbollah will go after SLA even after peace

BEIRUT (AP) — The leader of guerrillas fighting Israel's occupation of a border enclave said Sunday collaborators would be hunted down and killed even after a peace settlement.

Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah's threat appeared likely to complicate negotiations over an Israeli withdrawal from its so-called "security zone" in South Lebanon, a key Lebanese condition for peace.

The zone is patrolled by Israeli troops aided by militia of the surrogate South Lebanon Army (SLA), who are considered traitors by the Shiite Muslim group Hizbollah.

"The Islamic Resistance will finish them off before or after a settlement," Sheikh Nasrallah said at a memorial for a guerrilla killed in South Lebanon last week.

"There will be no mercy on family or sectarian lines. They all belong to one sect, the sect of treason. Their death is an irrevocable decision," Sheikh Nasrallah said in a speech carried by Hizbollah's television station.

However, repeating a call for SLA fighters to surrender, Sheikh Nasrallah added: "The door to repentance is open."

TEL AVIV (AP) — Israeli soldiers found and mistreated a seven-year-old Syrian boy who accidentally crossed the frontier, the army said. British Arabist Henderson dies

ABU DHABI (AP) — Edward Henderson, a noted British Arabist and London's first ambassador to Qatar, died last week. He was 77. Henderson died of old age last week in Qatar, his friend, Peter Hellyer, managing editor of the Middle East news newspaper, said Sunday. Henderson graduated from Oxford in 1940. He fought at Dunkirk in World War II and then served in Jordan and Syria. Henderson, who also witnessed the British withdrawal from Palestine in 1948, lived among the Arabs, particularly the bedouins, and their love was mutual, according to Mr. Hellyer. Henderson wrote his memoirs in 1988, titled "The Strange Eventful History." His funeral is to be held in England this week. He lived the last years of his life in Abu Dhabi with his wife Jocelyn, working at the Centre for Document and Research which he set up. The UAE president, Sheikh Zayed Ben Sultan Al Nahayan, is reputed to have said of Henderson: "We have seen many devoted British friends, but this man, Edward Henderson, is the best. He is sincere, kind and loves us as we love him."

Sudan boosts relations with Russia

KHARTOUM (AP) — Sudan and Russia agreed Sunday to step up economic cooperation as the second stage of a plan that also includes improved military ties. The decision to work out economic, commercial and technical accords came in talks here between Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Victor Poskvalyuk and Sudan's vice president, Major General Zubair Mohammad Salih, the official Sudanese News Agency (SUNA) reported. A high-level Sudanese delegation is to visit Moscow in May to sign the agreements. SUNA said, Mr. Poskvalyuk's team is the second high-level Russian delegation to visit Sudan this month. A military delegation ended a four-day visit April 6 with a pledge to revive Russian military assistance. The Soviet Union provided Sudan with arms and other equipment, including MIG-17 fighter jets and missiles, until 1971. Relations then began to sour after junior Sudanese officers with links to the Communist Party detained then-president Gaafar Numeiri and tried to impose a socialist regime. Numeiri escaped and, with Egyptian and Libyan help, rallied to defeat the rebels.

Indonesia seeks aid from Kuwait

JAKARTA (AP) — President Suharto on Monday asked Kuwait to consider giving aid to Indonesia, whose development plan has been hampered by inadequate infrastructure. Mr. Suharto made the request during a meeting with Kuwait's prime minister, Sheikh Saad Al Abdallah Al Salem Al Sabah, who also is the Kuwaiti crown prince. Briefing reporters on the meeting, State Secretary Minister Mardiono said Mr. Suharto specifically mentioned the state-owned aircraft factory, which needs funds to begin exporting its new turboprop jets on credit. Sheikh Saad will visit the aircraft factory Tuesday in the west Java capital of Bandung. Sheikh Saad said Kuwait wants to invest in oil refinery and bridges projects in Indonesia, Mr. Mardiono reported. He said senior officials of the two countries will meet again Tuesday to continue discussions on political and economic issues. The two leaders also touched on the latest developments in the Middle East including the latest developments in Iraq.

Algerian president vows to fight violence

ALGIERS (Agencies) — Algerian President Liamine Zeroual pledged to fight violence by Algeria's armed Islamic groups during a weekend meeting with political parties to discuss this year's presidential election.

Presidential spokesman Miboub Miboubi on Sunday quoted the president as telling 15 parties and organisations on Saturday that "the anti-terrorist struggle is continuing and will continue."

The country has been torn by three years of violent attacks here by Islamic fundamentalists targeting intellectuals, journalists and teachers which has left 30,000 people dead.

"The president who assumes responsibility for terrorism have refused to make the slightest effort to stop it," Mr. Miboubi quoted the president as saying.

Mr. Zeroual was referring to two Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) leaders sentenced to 12 years in prison but placed under house arrest in hopes they would appeal to armed Islamic groups to stop their attacks. They have reportedly been returned to prison.

President Zeroual also reiterated that presidential elections would take place as planned before the end of the year despite opposition from four parties, said Mr. Miboubi.

"The presidential vote has been scheduled and will take place because Algeria cannot surrender to a permanent political crisis," the president reportedly said.

The four parties calling for a delay signed in January a so-called "national contract" — a platform for talks with the government drawn up at a meeting in Rome, and rejected by Algeria's military-backed regime.

The four are the National Liberation Front (FLN), the former ruling party, the Socialist Forces Front (FFS), the Movement for Democracy in Algeria (MDA) and the Islamic Resistance Movement (MRLI-Al Nahda).

The communist Al Ikhla'at movement has also said it opposed elections.

Another party which he did not name remained "sceptical," said Mr. Miboubi.

But five parties and four civilian organisations including the powerful UGTA trade union had backed the idea of an election, said Mr. Miboubi.

Since March 27, Mr. Zeroual has held meetings with 11 parties and four organisations to discuss conditions for holding an election.

Islamic extremists began a virtual civil war against the secular regime after the government cancelled a 1992 general election the now-outlawed FIS was poised to win.

The army, in a separate statement, said rebels had suffered "stiff blows" and were now trapped like a "rat locked inside an electrified iron cage."

Mr. Zeroual, in a statement after he met political groups concerning plans for a presidential election later this year, said: "It is for those who opted for violence and destruction against the nation to stop these acts."

At this moment, and only at this moment, all prospects will be opened for national reconciliation with all the parties," Mr. Zeroual said in the statement carried by the national news agency APS.

"The state is still awaiting every sincere initiative, authentically Algerian and constructive to end the bloodshed of Algerians," Mr. Zeroual, who has pledged to hold elections later this year, said.

The army, in a rare statement, said it had gained the upper hand over the militants.

"Everywhere they are holed up — in mountains, villages or in towns — terrorist groups suffered stiff blows at the hand of the defenders of Algeria's independence and unity," the army added in a commentary carried by APS.

Algerian newspapers reported last month that the army had made sweeping attacks on militants and killed at least 2,800 of them. The government broadly hinted that the reports were true although it never provided details.

Sri Lankan maid executed in UAE

ABU DHABI (AFP) — A Sri Lankan housemaid has been executed in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) for murdering the four-year-old daughter of her employer, legal officials said on Monday.

Sirri Mohammad Faruq was executed by a firing squad in the northern emirate of Ras Al Khaimah on Thursday after she confessed to stabbing the child to death with a sharp object on Oct. 17, they said.

The Islamic court sentenced her to death in January and the verdict was endorsed by the emirate's ruler, Sheikh Saqr Ibn Mohammad Al Qasbi.

Judge Mohammad Dawoud, who sentenced the maid on Jan. 17, said she had pleaded guilty to the murder of Moza Said Salim.

"She confessed to the killing of the girl and was sentenced in accordance with Islamic law," the judge told AFP by telephone from Ras Al Khaimah, about 300 kilometres from Abu Dhabi.

"Her life could have been saved and the sentence could have been amended if the victim's parents had forgiven her. But they insisted on the death punishment according to Sharia (Islamic law)."

Court records showed the maid, in her 20s, had admitted she used a sharp steel key to stab the child in the chest after other parts of her body after she failed to resuscitate her when she had a fit.

"The child was unconscious, her body was shaking and saliva was oozing out of her mouth, I could not make her come round."

"I was frightened and unconsciously I pulled out the key and started to stab her," Sirri reportedly told court in the emirate, which strictly enforces Islamic law.

She said she then wrapped the child's body with a piece of cloth, crammed it into a box and buried her under a nearby deserted house.

Forensic reports did not mention whether the child suffered from epilepsy or other ailments, but showed death was due to heart failure caused by massive internal bleeding in the chest.

"We had given the maid the right to appeal. She did appeal but that court supported the death sentence," Mr. Dawoud said.

Sri Lankan embassy officials said they had tried to help Sirri and had seen her in prison several times before execution.

"We feel that she should not have killed the child and she herself felt very sorry and depressed."

"We had tried to help her by making an appeal but as you know she is a Muslim and the sentence was issued in accordance with Islamic law," an embassy spokesman told AFP.

He said embassy representatives were in Ras Al Khaimah on Monday to discuss arrangements for repatriating the maid's body.

In a separate case in the UAE, a Filipino housemaid has been on trial in the city of Al Ain on charges of murdering her local employer after he allegedly attacked her and tried to rape her.

Princess Basma stresses development at seminar on homemakers' needs

AMMAN (Petra) — Her Royal Highness Princess Basma Monday opened a seminar on the problems and needs of housewives at the community centre in Nazal district by underlining the role of Jordanian women in social development.

Community centres offer women the chance to take part in various training and in programmes designed to promote social development in the country, said the Princess in a brief address at the meeting.

Success of development work cannot be achieved by mere studies, but rather through practical work in the field where all citizens have a chance to participate in serving their country, said Princess Basma.

Referring to the social changes in the last few years, the Princess noted that women were more affected by these forces than any other segments of society.

Sociologist Sari Nasser, president of the Community Centres Society, outlined the objectives of the group noting that they are based on the concept of voluntary work for the development of local communities.

After the speeches, Princess Basma opened an exhibition displaying products such as flowers, garments and embroideries made by the community centre members.

The two-day seminar is scheduled to discuss social issues and housewife's needs, as well as the role of women in developing local communities.

Bahrain, Jordan upgrade trade protocol

MANAMA (Petra) — Jordan and Bahrain have agreed to exempt their exchanged agricultural and industrial products from import fees and all other customs duty.

The agreement was contained in a new protocol signed Monday in Manama by Minister of Industry and Trade Ali Abul Ragheb and Bahraini Minister of Trade and Agriculture Habib Qasem following talks over the last two days.

The new protocol, which updates one signed in 1975, urges the two sides to exert efforts to facilitate the flow of agricultural and industrial products between them and remove all related administrative and financial barriers.

Under the protocol, also, the two countries pledge to cooperate in the fields of land transport, tourism and financial markets.

They agreed to convene a meeting of the directors of the financial markets in the two countries to decide on measures related to listing Bahraini companies' operations in the Amman Financial Market (AFM) statements, and those of Jordan in the Bahraini financial market listing.

The protocol expressed Jordan's readiness to meet Bahrain's requirements of engineers, physicians and teachers, and voiced the Kingdom's keenness to promote bilateral relations and economic cooperation.

Mr. Abul Ragheb extended an invitation to Bahrain to participate in the Amman Economic Summit due to be held in Amman in October.

The Bahraini officials accepted the invitation and promised their country's active participation at the public and private levels.

After the signing of the protocol, Mr. Abul Ragheb inaugurated the Jordanian Industrial Fair which is displaying samples of products by 45 Jordanian firms.

Earth Week off to slow start RSCN chief calls for environmental action

By Cathy King
Jordan Times Staff Reporter

AMMAN — Earth Week held at the American Embassy Monday began slowly: visitors to the companies' exhibition and attendants at the presentations, were few in number.

"It has been slow today, but it should pick up during the week," said an embassy official. "The best day is expected to be the last day (Thursday) when school children will be presenting projects on the environment. We expect there to be as many as 5,000 visitors," she said.

Royal Society for the Conservation of Nature (RSCN) President Anis Muasher launched the symposium with a keynote address. His speech emphasised the need for immediate action and an end to conferences and seminars that have resulted in nothing.

"There is a problem of implementation. If we are to show we are serious about building up Jordan, we must start implementing the theories which have been regularly debated over the last three years, Mr. Muasher said.

He urged that the National Strategy for the Conservation of Nature, which was drawn up in 1990, be put into implementation given that the now era of peace will herald "more tourists, more industry and more production, (resulting in) more consumption. And unless we know what we're doing and unless we create sustainable development, we could destroy our beautiful Jordan."

In his speech Mr. Muasher traced the history of the Kingdom's environmental effort which began over 30 years ago when His Majesty King Hussein invited a group of environmentalists to Jordan.

But in the recent past, Mr. Muasher said that the numerous conferences and seminars had not prevented the Tala Dam from becoming polluted, the Amman, Dhleil and Jaffa basins from becoming saline and the virtual salinity of Azraq basin.

Urbanisation has destroyed 25 per cent of agricultural land, he said. "Had there been some forethought and planning, and we had moved 25 kilometres to the east we would have saved it," Mr. Muasher stated.

In addition and on the topic of bio-diversity, he said that grazing land which formerly constituted the "green cover," or the vegetation area between the desert and agricultural land, had been destroyed.

"This belt forms 12 per cent of Jordan. It was grazing land, but it has been destroyed through ploughing. Ploughing has been carried out to prove ownership, he said, adding that the only part of this area that has been preserved is now within the nature reserves.

On a more positive track, Mr. Muasher noted with enthusiasm the recent introduction of unleaded gasoline, but hoped that all "oil for cars" would soon be using it.

Meanwhile, Friends of Environment member and economics specialist Rasim Abdul Rahim believed the inclusion of an exhibition of companies' products during Earth Week, was to instil greater awareness of the importance of the environment to the business community.

Protection of the environment, Mr. Rahim asserted, is beneficial to the economy. Western technology, he said, is available to the Kingdom and could be developed and moulded to suit the country's needs. Mr. Rahim suggested that there should be concentration upon technology used in waste management, water resources management and recycling.

If Western technology is imported and to its specifications "features are added to produce technology more compatible with local society," Mr. Rahim affirmed, that the level of industrial technology would be raised, production levels would be increased and national output boosted, all leading to an increase in disposable income.

"This then gives a real value to GDP (Gross Domestic Product) and GNP (Gross National Product)," he said.

But he criticised the private sector for not taking the initiative, for failing to be creative or innovative. The private sector, he said, has become dependent on external assistance and policy makers. This, he said, was proved by the low attendance of private sector representatives on the first day of Earth Week.

"Only 30 people came to view the exhibition. There may be something to learn here," Mr. Rahim said, describing the private sector as lacking innovative "investment."

Earth Week, held at the American Embassy, will continue today (Tuesday) between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m., and on Wednesday and Thursday from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m.

The subject heading of today's presentations is bio-diversity and pollution problems, while Wednesday will focus on waste problems and recycling and Thursday has been dedicated to environmental projects undertaken by the Kingdom's youth.

PSD breaks 5 murder cases — official

By Rana Hussaini
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — The Public Security Department (PSD) Monday announced that since January Amman police have arrested several suspects in connection with separate murders and two additional crimes.

Amman Police Chief Brigadier General Adel Armouti told a press conference held at PSD headquarters in Abdali that since the beginning of the year police have solved five murder cases and arrested suspects in armed robbery and forgery cases.

Brig. Gen. Armouti said police apprehended several suspects in connection with the double murder of a 28-year-old woman and her six-month-old child who were found stabbed to death in the Sbmeisani area on March 18.

"We are gathering evidence (in the double murder case), and when we feel that all our procedures are completed we will announce the result of our investigations," he said.

In another murder case, he said, three people suspected of shooting and killing a 24-year-old student in Yajouz area were arrested.

According to the police official, the three suspects, pretending to be secret police, lured the couple away, demanded money from the victim, Mohammad Ghanem, then shot him in the head.

In the third case, Brig. Gen. Armouti said, on April 12, a body of an Egyptian national was found dumped in a farm area in Sahab. According to the official, the body of Mazen Mohammad had several stab wounds.

"Our investigations led us to suspect, also an Egyptian national, who later confessed to killing Mr. Mohammad to avenge an old incident."

Brig. Gen. Armouti said that another incident which was solved recently involved a 62-year-old woman who was found stabbed to death in her apartment in Jabal Nasser.

"Preliminary investigations indicated that the fiancé of the victim's daughter was the primary suspect, and after questioning him he confessed," Brig. Gen. Armouti said adding that theft was the motive behind the crime.

The official added that the remaining two murders were crimes of honour. One occurred in Naour, and another in Marka, he said. The official, however would not reveal details of either of the case.

Brig. Gen. Armouti said that two people were arrested and charged with armed robbery of a jewellery shop in Jahal Nazal.

He said the shop owner was in his store when the two suspects entered and demanded to see a set of jewellery.

One of the suspects struck the owner with an object, said the official.

The shopowner resisted the men and they fled the scene, he said, adding that the shop owner had drawn his gun and gone after the intruders.

"He shot twice at them, but unfortunately a seven-year-old child who was standing nearby was hit with a stray bullet. The child survived," he said.

The police chief also reported that three people were apprehended and charged with the theft of official documents from the Department of Passports and Civil Registration in Sweileh.

According to the police chief, the suspects hid in the department and waited until working hours were over, then stole 10 passports, 10 family books, and 150 identity cards.

He said that the suspects used one identification card to cash a JD 3,500 cheque.

However, the men were caught in the second attempt when they were trying to cash a JD 7,500.

Police retrieved all the stolen documents.

The police official also reviewed the situation of crime in Jordan since January saying that "crime happens in every society, and our society is safe taking into consideration the rapid changes that are affecting our region."

Since the beginning of the year and until April 16, there were 5,977 crimes in the Kingdom.

"We conducted a study which revealed that sharp objects such as knives and switchblades were used in most crimes," Brig. Gen. Armouti said.

Therefore, he added, starting April 1, the PSD will monitor people with previous criminal records to see if they are carrying sharp objects.

"The law is on our side, and there are articles in the law that stipulate that we can seize such objects and apprehend anyone who carries them and present them to court," he said.

The police chief called on the press to take a more responsible role when covering murder cases.

"Recently some newspapers published inaccurate information on some murders, and in some incidents it distracted our investigation course," Brig. Gen. Armouti said, stressing that the authorities respect the freedom of the press and its right to publish anything it wants as long as it does not interfere with the investigation procedures.

"We hope that the media will take into consideration the circumstances of every case especially if the information that is published could serve the suspects," he said. He further added that citizens also play a major role in crime prevention.

Arab contractors open 3-day meeting Government seeks to update contracting laws

AMMAN (Petra) — The government is re-examining laws and regulations applicable to the contracting industry with a view to bringing them in line with modern requirements and international developments, Minister of Public Works and Housing Abdul Razzaq Ensour said.

Opening a three-day conference organised by the Arab Contractors Union in cooperation with the Jordanian Contractors Association (JCA), the minister said that the contracting sector in Jordan has contributed significantly towards promoting the national economy over recent years.

In 1994 alone, this sector invested JD 117 million in construction and infrastructure projects benefiting other sectors in the country, said the minister.

Highlighting the government's continued cooperation with the JCA, Dr. Ensour noted that the contracting sector is currently employing nearly 20 per cent of the Jordanian workforce and contributing by at least 10 per cent to the Kingdom's gross domestic product.

If the last four years witnessed a boom in activities of the construction and contracting sector, the years ahead are expected to open up greater opportunities in view of the expanding Jordanian economy and the greater role given to the private sector, the minister said.

Jordan negotiates with international firms on use of shale oil to produce electricity

By P.V. Vivekanand
Jordan Times Staff Reporter

AMMAN — Jordan is negotiating with international companies on the use of shale oil to produce electricity and shale ashes in the construction industry, according to Minister of Energy and Mineral Resources Samib Darwazah.

The move to "burn" shale rock to generate power came after Jordan found that extracting shale oil was economically infeasible in view of the low international price of oil.

Jordan is estimated to have at least 40 billion tonnes of shale rocks with an average 10 per cent content of oil by weight. But it costs about $22 to $25 per barrel of oil, much higher than the international price of crude oil, the minister said in an interview with the Jordan Times.

Several countries, including China and some of the former Soviet republics, conducted research and studies on Jordanian shale in the late 80s. At that time it was found that it could cost around $18 to produce a barrel of shale oil while the crude prices in the international market were dramatically declining.

In addition, oil shale extraction also needs a very high level of investment. Subsequently, the government commissioned a study on the technical and economic feasibility of the direct combustion of shale oil for power generation.

The finding of the study was largely in favour of Jordan using its shale wealth to produce energy, and it recommended that a pilot project be set up.

Mr. Darwazah said: "At this stage we are negotiating with certain American, Swedish and Australian companies" on direct combustion of oil shale.

The general focus of the discussions is the "buy, own and transfer" mechanism under which the contracted company will invest its own funds and operate the facilities and will transfer the equipment to Jordanian ownership after the contract period. Further details of the negotiations were not immediately available.

"Once we find that it is economically feasible... after comparing the cost with our present costs of production... we will use oil shale to generate electricity," the minister said.

"Of course we have to bear in mind that oil shale is our natural resource while we are importing oil from abroad."

An additional advantage of direct combustion of oil shale is that the shale ashes could be used in the construction industry, he noted.

"Some technologies show that these ashes could be used for building roads, making bricks etc," he said. "We are studying all possibilities."

Mr. Darwazah said any increase in the use of Al Rishah gas to generate electricity would come only after a newly-set up government-owned commercial firm conducts thorough studies.

At present, the Rishah gas well produces 30 to 35 million cubic feet to run gas turbines. The power produced at the Rishah facilities represents about 18 per cent of Jordan's annual needs.

The deposits at Rishah, estimated at 215 billion cubic feet, are enough to maintain the present output for the next 10 years, said Mr. Darwazah.

Gas has been discovered at another site, about 50 kilometres from Al Rishah, but the deposits there have not been definitely established.

"We have good signs that we have gas" in the area, Mr. Darwazah said. "We have to decide now whether to use it immediately or keep it as reserve. Again, it is an economic decision."

Students plan unity rally, but university officials say 'timing is inappropriate'

By Rana Hussaini
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — The Student Union at the University of Jordan Monday said it will pursue its quest to organise a rally to call for national unity among students next Wednesday following ethnic clashes on campus over a week ago, despite the university administration's rejection to allow the rally.

The April 5 clashes between students of Saudi and Christian origin left 20 students injured and was followed by a smaller brawl in which three people were injured. Community leaders' interference to solve the problem failed.

During a press conference Monday at the university, Student Union members condemned the "regrettable events" that occurred on their campus and said that they have a "quick plan of action to try to solve the conflict."

"One of the main aims of our newly elected student body was to form a programme to solve the problem that occurred between small groups of students at the university," a Student Union statement said.

The statement charged that the events could have been minimised if people from outside the university had not interfered, referring to the attempts by community leaders to bring the situation to an end.

"The Student Union felt that the clashes were limited and that the conflict could have been solved within the university premises, but parties from outside the university interfered in the case," the statement said.

This statement maintained, under the Student Union's efforts to end the conflict peacefully and at the same time it instigated both parties involved and augmented the incident which "reflected negatively on our national unity."

The Student Union also faulted the university administration in mishandling the situation accusing it of practising oppression instead of focusing on more important issues.

The Student Union statement rejected their bid to conduct a rally because outside pressure on the university prevented it from approving such a gathering.

A university official, however, told the Jordan Times Monday that the reason the university administration rejected the rally was that "it is not the right time for it."

"The atmosphere is still tense, and such a gathering might spark an incident. We do not want to take any chances," the official said.

According to the official, more than 30 students have been questioned so far, and dozens more are expected to be questioned in connection with the brawls. It might take some time before the investigations are completed, the official added.

Writers tire of debate on normalisation

By Sa'eda Kilani
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — Some Jordanian writers called for ending the current debate over normalisation because they see the conflict as negatively affecting the cultural atmosphere of the country.

In a seminar held at the Jordanian Arab Democratic Party headquarters on Sunday evening, prominent writers expressed their disappointment over what they termed as the futile debate over normalisation that is being waged at all levels and in all organisations and movements, and contended that normalisation can be mainly fought by liberating the Arab mind.

Prominent writer Mu'nis Razzaz, former president of the Jordanian Writers Association (JWA), said some writers, who are holding the banners of anti-normalisation, have wasted the time and efforts of the JWA's former administrative committee engaging in recurrent squabbles.

Instead, Mr. Razzaz said, writers and the public as well should have concentrated on tackling the main social and political problems that dominate the Arab societies.

According to Mr. Razzaz, a columnist at Al Dustour Arabic daily, normalisation can only be combatted through the liberation of the Arab mentality and through encouraging intellectuals and writers to be more productive and creative.

"For 500 years, the Arab mind has been living in the darkness," he said. "Ibda' (creativity) has been linked with bida'a (false religious beliefs) in the past, and the instigators of bida'a were considered blasphemous and deserving of death penalty."

"The issue now is not how do we combat normalisation, it is how do we combat the pastoral and agricultural mentality," he added. "If we just try to rid ourselves of the cold war mentality that dominates our lives, our political parties and our movements... we will be able to combat normalisation."

Mr. Razzaz did not give a definition of the word normalisation. Instead he relayed that task to women's activist Huda Fakhouri who defined normalisation as having any direct contact with the Israeli Zionist institutions.

Mr. Razzaz explained:

"We have had three very long conferences at the association to discuss what do we mean by normalisation, and every time we reach a dead end and we start again from zero. I'm sick of the word normalisation. I see it everywhere, at night and in my daydreams."

One of the participants at the two-hour meeting asked whether writers have a good knowledge of Israeli literature, culture or politics.

Writer Hashem Gharaibeh said, no.

"We have not made an effort to know anything about our enemy, while they (Israelis) have conducted thousands of studies on us and know the smallest details," Mr. Gharaibeh said.

Another participant asked whether normalisation of relations should be combatted with all Israelis or some of them or only with politicians. "Who is the target? Is it the Jew himself/herself? Is it the politicians or the Zionist movement? If the Jordanian regime occupied another land, does that mean that all Jordanians approve this policy?" the participant asked.

There have been no clear answers to all these questions.

Filipino foreign secretary resigns in maid case

MANILA (AP) — In a move to mollify his critics, President Fidel Ramos Monday announced he has accepted the resignation of Foreign Secretary Roberto Romulo, who has been under fire in the wake of the hanging of a Filipino maid in Singapore last month.

Mr. Ramos said in a nationally televised press conference that he accepted Mr. Romulo's resignation "with deep regret" and appointed the Philippine Ambassador to Japan, Domingo Siazon, as Mr. Romulo's successor. Mr. Romulo will remain in office until April 30 and Mr. Siazon will take over on May 1, Mr. Ramos said.

Mr. Ramos, however, still has not decided on whether to accept the resignation of Labour Secretary Nieves Confesor, who has also come under pressure to resign over the hanging of Filipino maid Flor Contemplacion.

Mrs. Contemplacion was hanged on March 17 for the 1991 killing of fellow Filipina maid Delia Maga and her 4-year-old Singaporean ward, Nicholas Huang. Many Filipinos believe she was framed. Ms. Confesor is chairwoman of the governing board of the International Labour Organisation (ILO). Mario Galman, a spokesman of the ILO office in Manila, said removing Ms. Confesor "will not look good internationally."

Ms. Confesor has said she has a "standing" offer to resign since joining the Ramos cabinet in June 1992. "I just keep working and see if mine is the next head to roll," she said. "I guess the issue here is not competence or ineffectiveness. Do you really have to sack a person just to appease?"

Mr. Ramos has been under pressure to remove both Mr. Romulo and Ms. Confesor. His political opponents have used the Maga-Contemplacion case as an election issue against administration candidates in the May 8 election.

The administration is sensitive to criticisms about the 3 million Filipinos working overseas from relatives at home. Filipino overseas workers contribute about $1 billion to the economy yearly in remittances.

Sen. Blas Ople, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, supported Mr. Ramos' move, saying it was a "signal" that foreign policy should now begin serving the millions of Filipinos working abroad.

"I hope that in the future it will not be necessary for the president to carry out a program of the cabinet every time a mishap occurs to placate public anger over the way Filipinos abroad are mistreated by host countries," Mr. Ople said.

The two officials have been criticised for not giving enough support to Mrs. Contemplacion.

Thousands demonstrated at the Singapore embassy to protest the hanging despite appeals to stay the execution to prevent purported "new evidence" to prove her innocence.

A presidential commission that investigated the Maga-Contemplacion case said in a report submitted to Mr. Ramos two weeks ago that Mr. Romulo and Ms. Confesor have become ineffective in their posts and recommended firing about a dozen other officials.

Last week, Mr. Ramos fired the former ambassador to Singapore, suspended the current envoy and seven other labour and foreign affairs officials for negligence and incompetence.

He also ordered state prosecutors to consider criminal charges against them and two other former heads of the Overseas Workers Welfare Administration.

Mr. Ramos made no reference to the Contemplacion case in accepting the Romulo's resignation, which was made two weeks ago.

He commended Mr. Romulo for his expertise, managerial skills, integrity and professionalism in directing the government's diplomatic thrust of strengthening economic ties with other countries.

In a breaking voice, Mr. Romulo later told reporters that the uproar over the hanging of Mrs. Contemplacion has derailed the focus of the nation in developing the economy. He also said the government has come under unfair criticism by political opponents of Mr. Ramos.

"It is my desire now that the country will be able to see the situation from a cooler and more objective perspective," Mr. Romulo said. "I hope that the partisan politics surrounding the Maga-Contemplacion case will subside."

"In my heart of hearts, the Maga-Contemplacion case is tragic though it may be and serious though it is, I felt that it detracted from the overall ambition and the actual performance of this administration. So I felt that if we can put this to rest with my resignation, so let it be."

Relations between the Philippines and Singapore have been severely strained since the hanging but both Mr. Ramos and Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong appeared recently to be trying to patch them up.

The two agreed to send Singaporean forensic experts to examine the remains of Delia Maga, who was said to have been strangled to death.

Filipino medical examiners from the National Bureau of Investigation, however, said Mrs. Maga was severely beaten and was strangled merely to finish her off.

Fire kills 11 in Taiwan

TAIPEI (AP) Fire swept through a Taipei nightclub before dawn Monday, killing 11 people and injuring 13 in the second major club blaze this year. Police suspected arson.

One man was burned to death at the door of an elevator in the Hymns Of Happiness Karaoke Club, and 10 others who escaped via a stairway died after being hospitalized for smoke inhalation, police said.

Three of the injured were listed in critical condition, they said.

It was the latest in a series of deadly fires in recent years, and renewed questions about Taiwan's fire safety standards, criticised as lax after 64 people died in February in the island's deadliest blaze.

Police were looking for a man suspected of tossing a firebomb into the lobby of the five-story building, starting the fire, officer Oung Chung-Ho told reporters. The club was on the top three floors. A beauty parlor on the first two floors also was gutted.

State radio quoted bar waitresses as saying a man, thought to be a disgruntled customer, had threatened to set fire to the club. It did not elaborate.

The club contained 39 customers and employees, mostly young people, and 15 escaped or were rescued unhurt, police said.

"We were singing in a room and suddenly it went all black," survivor Lin Mei-Hui told the radio. "The smoke was so thick that we could not find the exit."

Ms. Lin said she and two friends escaped unharmed from the fifth floor by climbing down an outdoor advertising billboard.

Fire officer Chang Ching-Ruog said the club used flammable materials in its partitions and decorations but otherwise met safety standards.

The club was licensed as a food store and had been fined nine times — a total of 168,000 Taiwan dollars ($6,500) — over the past two years for operating a karaoke bar instead, officials said.

Taipei Mayor Chen Shui-bian expressed regret for the fire and said that a crackdown against illegal businesses which violate safety or zoning codes would continue, but could take some time.

"There are just too many of them," he said.

City councillors accused Mr. Chen of failing to fulfil promises to improve safety in the capital.

sing-along to taped music on TV. The clubs have suffered at least five deadly fires in four years.

Critics say that fire precautions have been neglected in Taiwan's rapid economic growth, which has created a thriving but crowded urban nightlife. Officials figures show fire deaths rose from 250 in 1991 to 371 last year.

Asia's Davids begin defying Chinese Goliath

BEIJING (AFP) — China's neighbours, while deeply worried over its ambitions in the region, are in growing numbers starting to openly defy the Asian giant.

The visit of the Tibetan religious leader, the Dalai Lama, to Japan for the first time in 11 years in early April was among the latest in a list of instances demonstrating a change in the attitude of Asia's Davids towards the Chinese Goliath.

Japan chose to ignore a Chinese warning delivered beforehand.

"We call upon Japan not to allow the Dalai Lama's visit to lead to a deterioration in bilateral relations," Foreign Ministry spokesman Chen Jian had said on the eve of the Tibetan leader's visit.

It was not the first instance of the Japanese taking a dim view of Chinese dictat. In October, they had allowed Taiwanese Vice-Premier Hsu Li-Teh to be present at the Hiroshima Asian Games, ignoring repeated Chinese protests.

But by granting a visa to the Dalai Lama, the 1989 Nobel Peace laureate, Japan seemed to be confirming its determination to stand up to China, thereby exposing the limits of Beijing's diplomatic strategy based on threats, according to analysts here.

The Japanese calculations clearly paid off, because Qiao Shi (chairman of the National People's Congress) went ahead with his visit to Japan on the heels of the Dalai Lama, and the Japanese Prime Minister, Tomiichi Moriyama, will come to China in May, an Asian diplomat said.

The Philippines, for its part, appeared to be holding out against China over the vexed issue of the Spratly Islands to the South China Sea, claimed wholly or partly by the two countries as well as Brunei, Malaysia, Taiwan and Vietnam.

Manila, which had kept a low profile on what has emerged as the burning question in the South East Asian region, recently sent its naval vessels to destroy some structures built by the Chinese on several disputed atolls.

Instead of making loud protests as was its wont until recently, Beijing this time curiously contented itself with a public denunciation of what it called Manila's "futile actions."

"None wants to, or can, challenge Beijing in the region but an increasing number of countries are realising that it is dangerous for them and for regional stability if they were to keep kowtowing to the Chinese dragon," the Asian diplomat said.

"It seems the Asian countries are taking at its word the Chinese government's assertion that 'the world needs China and China needs the world,'" a Western diplomat said.

China is at present concentrating on comprehensive modernisation and therefore needs to multiply its trade and economic contacts with its neighbours, the diplomat added.

Other observers say the regional rebellion stems from the uncertainties besetting the Communist regime which is anxiously awaiting the passing of the 90-year-old patriarch Deng Xiaoping, who has not been seen in public for 14 months.

The Chinese leadership, with state president and party chief Jiang Zemin as its head, has been weakened by internal struggles and Asian countries are taking advantage of it to advance their own agenda, observers say.

Even Indonesia, which had stayed out of the Spratly dispute, has got in on the act. It has kindled a boundary dispute with China over the Natuna Islands close to the Spratlys.

For its part, Taiwan, the island administered by the Nationalists which China claims as its own province, has kept up its aggressive quest for diplomatic contacts.

Taiwanese President Lee Teng-Hui who had made a high-profile "private" visit to several South East Asian countries in early 1994, recently went to the United Arab Emirates and Jordan.

Much to Beijing's chagrin, he has few more "vacations" plans up his sleeve, including a possible one to the United States, although Washington has until now resisted Mr. Lee's overtures for fear of offending the Chinese.

French Channel ferry starts to sink after passengers, crew evacuate

SAINT HELIER, Jersey (AFP) — A French ferry which ran into difficulties as it was carrying 307 passengers to Jersey in the Channel Islands began sinking Monday after the vessel was evacuated.

Five crew members who had remained aboard to take part in a towing operation have now left the ship, the Saint Malo, port authorities in Jersey's capital, Saint Helier, said.

About 16 of the passengers were slightly injured during a large-scale rescue operation after the ship sprang a leak in rough seas off the self-governing Channel Islands, which are British crown property.

The injured, who suffered fractures, were being taken to hospital, the St. Helier Coast Guards added. Other passengers were being treated for shock.

Those needing treatment were evacuated by helicopter and a British Royal Navy ship.

Dole: Foster nomination 'in extremis'

WASHINGTON (AP) — Two leading U.S. presidential candidates on Sunday said passage of a constitutional amendment to ban abortion was unlikely, but both suggested they would use their power if elected to limit access to the controversial procedure.

"We all know that the there is not a consensus in the party or in the country to reform the constitution," said Sen. Phil Gramm on CBS's Face The Nation. "But that doesn't mean there aren't things we can do."

His opponent for the Republican nomination in the 1996 race, Senate majority leader Bob Dole, reflected similar views on NBC's Meet The Press.

Sen. Dole, whose comments appeared aimed at conservatives who are angered by what they see as America's moral decline, said Dr. Henry Foster's bid to be surgeon general is all but dead.

Sen. Dole said it may not even get out of committee. "If it does, I'm not certain that I'll call it up," he said. "I'd say the nomination is 'in extremis.' It's not very viable right now."

Hearings are slated to begin on May 2 before the Senate Labour and Human Resources Committee. Only Dr. Foster and members of Congress will be called to testify.

Dr. Foster has run into opposition on Capitol Hill for understating the number of abortions he has performed.

Meanwhile, Mr. Gramm, reiterated his pledge to end affirmative action and balance the federal budget by the end of his first term if elected president.

He refused to support the Clinton administration's review of affirmative action, saying "the facts are in," and vowing to end "quotas and set-asides."

India's Congress leaders in disarray

NEW DELHI (R) — The leadership of India's ruling Congress is locked in a curious game of shadow boxing as the party begins to shape up for general elections due within 14 months.

As the main opposition party, the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Jaoata Party (BJP), prepares for a top level electoral strategy meeting next week, Congress appears in total disarray, its leaders anxiously jockeying for position against almost any eventuality.

While dissidents discuss whether to set up a rival party, other leaders are taken up with private battles and still more are struggling to sit on an ever more shaky political fence.

Much of the party's current discomfort arises from the decision of a dissident former junior minister to lodge several amendments, or "cut" motions, to the government budget, due to be debated in parliament later this month.

Rangarajan Kumaramangalam said the changes he was seeking, including increased food subsidies for the poor and cheaper electricity for farmers, reflected agreed policies of the ruling party. Underlining growing divisions in the party, dissidents said as many as 34 Congress members of parliament might support the amendments, which would cut to the heart of the government's economic policies.

Suggestions the main opposition parties might join the dissidents, threatening Congress' fragile majority, have triggered another round of soul searching. Congress says it controls a six- or seven-seat majority in the 545-member lower house where allegiances can shift with political winds.

Prime Minister P.V. Narasimha Rao, who appears increasingly unable to quell the squabbling in his ruling party ranks, waded into the argument, threatening to call a snap poll if his opponents united against him.

While the BJP said Mr. Rao should go ahead and call an early election, which might work to the opposition party's advantage following successes in recent provincial polls, others were not so keen.

Congress members of parliament fretted that the party was ill prepared for an early vote, and even the dissidents appeared to row back from militancy.

"The cut motions probably won't come up in the house," the Business Standard quoted a dissident source as saying. "But our purpose is served as the issues have found the media attention we desired."

The leader of the Congress dissidents, expelled former cabinet minister Arjun Singh, was meanwhile going ahead with plans to form a new party in May, drawing support from his power base in the central Indian state of Madhya Pradesh.

But his main potential ally, former Finance and Foreign Minister N.D. Tiwari, who commands widespread Congress support in India's largest state Uttar Pradesh, continued to withhold full support from Mr. Singh.

And for the two top Congress leaders in India's most industrialised state, Maharashtra, a former party stronghold lost in local assembly elections last month, personal differences appeared to dominate the agenda.

With Sharad Pawar out of the state house in Bombay, his arch foe Sudhakarrao Naik was back in town, meeting opposition leaders and organising a campaign to recapture the leadership of the state Congress Party from Mr. Pawar.

U.S. admission on Vietnam causes Australian rift

SYDNEY (Agencies) — Australia's top-rank Conservative have split over the nation's role in the Vietnam War, with one war-time premier calling it wrong and another defending the decision to send in troops 30 years ago.

In a renewed debate sparked by a former U.S. defence secretary's admission that "we were wrong", former Prime Minister Sir John Gorton said it was now clear that neither the United States nor Australia should have entered the war.

"Now I don't think the war was justified," Sir John said in remarks published in the Australian newspaper Monday.

Sir John led Australia from 1968 to 1971, when Australian troops fought with U.S. forces against North Vietnam's Communist army for the same avowed reason, to stop the spread of communism.

But in a column printed in the same newspaper, ex-Prime Minister Malcolm Fraser, Sir John's defence minister, defended the reasons for sending in troops in 1965.

"I believed the cause was right," Mr. Fraser wrote, accusing U.S. forces of not using more effective tactics in the prolonged conflict, which ended with the fall of Saigon in 1975.

U.S. forces pulled out of Vietnam in 1973. Australia withdrew the year before, after 424 of its troops were killed.

"Presumed solutions were put forward to meet political requirements, not military ones," Mr. Fraser wrote of U.S. tactics. He also rejected former U.S. Defence Secretary Robert McNamara's change of heart on the war.

"We were wrong. Terribly wrong," Mr. McNamara wrote in his memoir published last week. As defence secretary for seven years until 1968, he played such a prominent role in the Vietnam War that it was once known in the United States as "McNamara's war."

His book has prompted soul-searching within Australia's Liberals, the Conservative Party that ruled the country for decades until 1972.

Now in opposition, the party's foreign-affairs spokesman, Alexander Downer, defended Australia's role in the war, saying fears that communism would spread from Vietnam into South East Asia "did have some substance."

"If we hadn't had any involvement in the war, but more significantly... if the United States hadn't been involved in the Vietnam War and held up the South Vietnamese government for as long as it was held up, then it's hard to know what the implications would have been for neighbouring countries," he said in a television interview at the weekend.

Historian Glen Barclay said Monday that Mr. Downer should now admit his Liberal Party predecessors were wrong to pursue "the only really unpopular" war Australia has got into.

The evidence showed Australia's interests were not threatened, he said.

"They are not prepared to admit that the whole thing was misbegotten from the start and that there was no evidence justifying intervention in Vietnam," Mr. Barclay of the University of Queensland said.

"I think Conservative politicians now would gain a great deal of credibility if they do say quite frankly that previous Conservative governments made mistakes," he told Reuters.

Meanwhile, Australia's Governor-General Bill Hayden was due in Hanoi Monday at the start of a ceremonial visit that follows on the heels of a trip by a parliamentary group that looked into human rights issues here.

The visit here is the first by a governor-general — the representative in Australia of the head of state Queen Elizabeth II. Mr. Hayden is being accorded the full honours of a state visit by his host President Le Duc Anh.

Mr. Hayden is due to hold talks with Mr. Anh and Prime Minister Vo Van Kiet

Last week a parliamentary delegation visited the country for talks on human rights and religious issues, a sensitive problem between the two countries.

In a statement released as they left, the delegation defended its visit from charges that it has only heard the official Vietnamese line on human rights and saying that it had been able to hear a wide range of views.

Vietnam leader in Japan

TOKYO (AFP) — Vietnamese leader Do Muoi arrived here Monday for a five-day visit aimed at securing more economic aid and getting Japanese advice on how to ease the difficult transition to a market economy.

The general secretary of the Vietnamese Communist Party, accompanied by Foreign Minister Nguyen Manh Cam, was scheduled to hold talks with Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama Tuesday and call on Emperor Akihito Wednesday.

The 78-year-old Vietnamese leader had said before arriving in Tokyo that he would ask Japan to boost its aid programme and make bolder investments in Vietnam, which has a market of 72 million people.

"We would like Japan to provide us with better assistance to help us more quickly overcome our difficulties," he said.

Japan is the number-one aid donor to Vietnam, with soft loans and grants totalling 60 billion yen ($723 million) a year.

Japan is also the leading trade partner of Vietnam, with total trade totalling $2 billion a year.

But Japanese businessmen, wary of the Vietnamese Communist government's capacity to shift rapidly to a market economy, are treading cautiously in the area of investments.

Japan as a result is only the fifth biggest investor in Vietnam, trailing behind Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore and South Korea.

U.K. telephone codes change

LONDON (R) — British Telecommunications (BT), laid on extra telephone operators to handle an expected deluge of inquiries about a nationwide change in dialling codes. All British telephone codes now start with a "0" while five-figure codes now start with a "1" while five-figure codes now start with a "2".

field, Leeds and Leicester have entirely new codes. For example, the code for Central London becomes (017) dialled as 44-171 from outside the country. The £100 million ($160 million) change, made in response to a growing demand for telephone numbers, enables BT to introduce up to 10 billion new numbers into the next century. A team of 60 operators was on duty waiting to deal with calls from customers confused by the change, and callers who misdial will automatically be switched to a recorded announcement telling them of the new codes, BT said.

China province battles to save rare birds

SHANGHAI (R) — A Chinese province has launched a battle to save rare birds from poachers in one of the world's most important sanctuaries, the Librarian Daily reported Monday. The newspaper said the governor of China's eastern Jiangsu province, home of Poyang Lake, where almost all of the world's last few Siberian cranes spend the winter, had ordered a police crackdown on poachers. Wu Guangzhong took action after the Librarian Daily reported that 30,000 birds were being massacred each year on the lake, most by poisoning, the newspaper said. After reading the report in February, Mr. Wu "very quickly issued instructions demanding tough measures to properly solve the problem."

Provincial police are investigating several cases involving the purchase and transport of rare birds, it said. The newspaper had reported there were only four forestry police and 40 park rangers with little equipment to patrol an area of the lake that attracts migrating cranes, storks and swans. Many of the slaughtered birds end up in cooking pots in southern China, the paper said.

Britain seems to be buried under lottery debts

LONDON (R) — Britons may be neglecting their health and their pets or even spending less on funerals to finance their latest craze, gambling. The hugely successful National Lottery, launched last November, has beaten all forecasts, with 30 million people now gambling £100 million ($160 million) on it each week. But what Britons scramble to place their bets, they may be scrimping on other purchases. Spending on undertakers dropped 11.1 per cent during the quarter, to £120 million ($190 million) from £135 million ($215 million) in the previous three months.

George Michael's one-spin hit

LONDON (R) — A long-awaited new single from pop superstar George Michael has made a once-only appearance on the airwaves, and helped to raise £70,000 ($112,000) for charity. Michael's fans have been waiting for months to hear the latest song — "Jesus For A Child." A protracted legal battle in which the 31-year-old singer is seeking to be released from his contract with recording company Sony had frustrated them. But he agreed the record could be played once as part of an annual appeal for funds for needy children mounted by London radio station Capital FM.

Karadzic: Serbs will fight on until 'the final victory'

BELGRADE (AFP) — Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic vowed as he closed a session of the self-styled Bosnian Serb "parliament" at dawn Monday. The parliament began meeting Saturday at Sanski Most in northwest Bosnia. The supreme command and chief-of-staff of the army of the Serb Republic (in Bosnia) will take all measures necessary to win a final military victory against the enemy, if a political settlement of the conflict is not reached rapidly, Mr. Karadzic was quoted as saying by the Bosnian Serb News Agency (SRNA) monitored here. The military situation in the Serb-controlled areas of Bosnia dominated closed-door debates at the parliament, the agency said, without giving details. The session appears to have been given over to frank talking between the politicians and the military on recent setbacks suffered by Serb forces, particularly in the Mount Vlasica zone of central Bosnia and the Bihac pocket in the northwest. General Ratko Mladic, commander of the Serb forces, as chief rapporteur to the parliament was called on repeatedly to answer deputies' questions. The parliament agreed on the need to "strengthen the military capability" of the self-declared Bosnian Serb Republic, Mr. Karadzic said.

Gen. Ratko Mladic

nian Serb Republic and the self-proclaimed Serb Republic of Krajina in Croatia "to draw up a plan for the unification of the two states." The question, which was to have been one of the main points of the meeting in Sanski Most, was relegated to second place because of reservations on the part of the Krajina leaders, who do not want to hamper Serbia's President Slobodan Milosevic in his attempt to have sanctions against Belgrade lifted. "We have followed the advice of the motherland, which asked us not to create a state west of the Drina River (the natural border between Serbia and Bosnia), because we are sure that it (Serbia) will play a role in unification of all the Serbs," the self-styled president of Krajina, Milan Martić, was quoted as saying Monday by the Belgrade daily Nasa Borba. Meanwhile the U.N. Protection Force has resumed flying into besieged Sarajevo on a limited scale, but the humanitarian air bridge remained suspended Monday because of earlier Serb firing at planes, a U.N. official said here. UNPROFOR was "resuming flights in a progressive way," but was currently restricting the categories of passengers flown in the light of objections raised by the Bosnian Serbs, military spokesman Lieutenant-Colonel Gary Coward indicated here. On Sunday, four UNPROFOR flights landed here and six were planned for Monday. The planes were carrying cargo, U.N. personnel and a limited number of diplomats. Air links were cut on April 8 after Bosnian Serbs fired at a C-130 transport plane flying in humanitarian aid to the city. The plane was raked by 10 automatic gunfire shots, with at least one impacting on the cockpit screen. There were no injuries. Flights remained suspended because of the Serbs' refusal "to guarantee the safety." But the killing of two soldiers from the French contingent Friday and Saturday in Sarajevo gave an opportunity to the United Nations to force the issue. French Armed Forces Chief-of-Staff Admiral Jacques Lanxade and French Defence Minister Francois Leotard flew in on two separate flights to collect the bodies of the dead soldiers.

Russians forces prepare new attack on Chechen rebel areas

MOSCOW (Agencies) — Russia is preparing a fresh assault on the last rebel bastion in lowland Chechnya after at least 10 servicemen were killed in earlier abortive attacks, ITAR-TASS news agency said Monday. It quoted military sources in the breakaway region as saying that the assault on the stronghold of Bamut in western Chechnya had been stopped Sunday to avoid further losses among Russian troops but that a decisive assault would be attempted soon. TASS said the rebels — who have consistently pledged to resist to the last fighter — had rejected a new ultimatum by Russian troops to lay down their arms and surrender. Russia is keen to put down organised resistance in Chechnya as fast as possible. Key world leaders, many of them deeply critical of Moscow's bloody Chechen campaign, are due to arrive on May 9 for celebrations marking the 50th anniversary of allied victory in World War II. With the fall of Bamut, Russia would effectively gain control over the fertile and industrially developed areas in northern and central Chechnya, squeezing the rebels out to remote mountainous areas in the south of the region. Russia poured troops into Chechnya last December to quell the region's three-year drive for independence. Thousands of people have been forced to flee their homes as the military operation, the biggest Moscow has waged since the 10-year Afghan war, devastated the oil-rich territory. Bamut, situated on a mountain slope, appears to be a tough nut for the Russians to crack because the rebels are sheltering in a heavily-fortified former Soviet missile base, built to resist nuclear attacks. Even after Moscow drives out rebel forces from all their strongholds it will have to keep a considerable force in the volatile north Caucasus province to tackle guerrilla warfare, which is currently on the rise. Defence Minister Pavel Grachev said Sunday Moscow could not stick to the 1990 Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty (CFE), which includes limits on deployment of non-nuclear arms in its volatile southern region, until the Chechen conflict was over. "The amount of arms and military equipment which the treaty allows Russia to have in this region is insufficient," he told Interfax News Agency. It was unclear whether Gen. Grachev's comments reflected the Kremlin's official position. "We did not receive instructions to comment on Gen. Grachev's statement," a spokesman for President Boris Yeltsin said Monday. But the statement will undoubtedly set off fresh protests from Russia's Western partners, who have watched Moscow's actions in Chechnya with growing alarm. The CFE treaty, which includes 30 nations and covers an area from the Atlantic to the Urals, provides for the biggest cuts of conventional weapons in arms control history and stipulates the distribution of troops and armour. In Grozny, theoretically under Russian control since mid-February, guerrillas fired shots at a military administration building and in other parts of the town. A captain in the Russian Ministry of Emergency Situations was killed in one of the incidents.

At Stary-Atagui, 25 kilometres south of Grozny, a Russian military car escorting a convoy of 10 trucks of humanitarian aid from the Red Cross, drove over a mine and three people were injured, the Russian military command said. A six-member mission from the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which arrived over the weekend in Grozny, was due to begin work Monday. OSCE special envoy to Chechnya, Istvan Gyarmati, said on arrival that he was outraged by Russian army tactics in the recent capture of the village of Samshki in western Chechnya. Witnesses have accused the army of carrying out summary executions last week and sending fire to houses with their occupants still inside. Samshki had held out for weeks against Russian attacks and was one of the last remaining pockets of resistance in the republic's western lowlands. The OSCE announced late last month that its mission, being sent to monitor respect for human rights and report violations, would work with Russian authorities and within the framework of Russian law.

North criticises planned U.S.-S.Korean exercises

SEOUL (AP) — North Korea Monday blasted planned U.S.-South Korean military manoeuvres as a provocation leading to "the brink of war." But a top U.S. military official defended the combined exercises as necessary for readiness and said there is no link with political developments on the Korean peninsula. The manoeuvres, scheduled for later this month, are designed to rehearse how troops in South Korea would be reinforced in a crisis, the Pentagon told reporters Friday. About 13,000 troops in South Korea will be involved, along with about 1,300 Americans from other regions. Much of the work will involve logistics experts who would be involved in preparing the way for deployments here if conflict broke out. North Korea's official news agency (KCNA) issued a statement Monday criticising the exercises and attempting to link them with implementation of a 6-month-old accord aimed at dismantling the North's suspect nuclear programme. "This is a grave military provocation leading the situation on the Korean peninsula to the brink of war and an anti-dialogue, anti-peace, anti-reunification move," KCNA said. "The U.S. bellicose military quarters and hardline conservatives are intensifying threat and pressure.... The bellicose elements must clearly know that those who are fond of fire are bound to die in the fire." U.S. Col. Mike Sullivan dismissed any link between the nuclear accord and the manoeuvres, which he said were planned several months ago and also were held last year. At a briefing for reporters in Seoul, Col. Sullivan listed a variety of exercises that are held each year in South Korea to maintain readiness and enforce continuity in a U.S. military force that is constantly changing due to the average soldier's one-year stint. "It would be unconscious-able not to train in a robust, vigorous way with what you're faced with in the North and their potential," Col. Sullivan said. North Korea's military is more than 1 million strong, with two-thirds deployed within 100 kilometres of the demilitarised zone that separates the two Koreas, making it the world's most heavily guarded border. "By any standard, they are well-equipped and vigorously trained," Col. Sullivan said. He said the forward-deployed group includes more than 80,000 special forces commandos and is backed by thousands of artillery pieces, hundreds of which are capable of reaching Seoul. Still, he downplayed any suggestion of increased tensions on the peninsula. "Not once in the 20-something months I've been here has anyone in this command seen anything construed as particularly threatening out of North Korea," Col. Sullivan said. He said this month's exercises are particularly important because the U.S. contingent of 37,000 troops makes up only about 5 per cent of the military force in South Korea, so reinforcements would be crucial in the event of conflict. The primary U.S.-South Korean exercise, Team Spirit, has been cancelled the last two years in an effort to ease tensions with the North and convince it to abide by the nuclear accord that was signed last October between the North and the United States. It calls for the hardline Communist state to dismantle its nuclear programme, suspected of weapons development, in exchange for two light-water reactors that produce far less weapons-grade plutonium, along with other economic and diplomatic incentives. The accord has bogged down recently over who will provide the reactors. The North has rejected reactors from South Korea, citing safety concerns, but the real reason is believed to be national pride.

Japan cult leader ordered gas production

TOKYO (R) — The leader of a Japanese doomsday cult ordered followers to produce the deadly gas sarin, the type of nerve gas used in attacks on Tokyo subways, media reports said Monday. Tokyo Broadcasting System (TBS) said the order from cult guru Shoko Asahara was mentioned in a detailed journal of the Aum Shinri Kyo (Supreme Truth Sect) confiscated by police. The journal, kept by members of the sect's "science and technology ministry," quoted Asahara as saying: "Making sarin is a very hazardous undertaking. When carrying this out, you need much courage." Police refused to comment on the report. So far, police have arrested about 100 cult members, including six senior officials, on various charges ranging from abduction to illegal production of weapons. The cult has been the focus of massive police raids since the March 20 subway attacks, but police have not linked the 10,000-strong sect directly to the attacks in which 12 people were killed and thousands injured. However, they have found a huge chemical stockpile, including all the ingredients of sarin, a laboratory and a plant at the sect's complex in Kamiku Isshiki, at the foot of Mt. Fuji west of Tokyo, that could have been used to make sarin. Asahara has not been seen in public since the day before the subway attacks. The cult also tried to arm itself with guns and tanks through "Russian connections," said Japanese news agency reported. Kyodo News Agency quoted police as saying a senior sect leader attempted to buy tanks from Russia and to make guns from parts bought in Russia. Kyodo said the sect's "construction minister" visited Russia several times to explore weapons purchases. Police regard the man, who was not identified, as the 40-year-old sect leader. Kyodo said the "construction minister" was involved in the sect's purchase of a Russian helicopter last June for some 78 million yen ($950,000). He invited Russian engineers to Japan last September through a Japanese travel agency that handles Russian tourists so that the helicopter could be modified for the sect's needs. Kyodo gave no other details. Last week, Russian President Boris Yeltsin ordered a full investigation into the activities of the sect, which says it has 30,000 members in Russia. A Moscow court has frozen the sect's bank assets and ordered its property confiscated. Meanwhile, Tokyo appeared back to normal Monday, four weeks after the subway attacks, after living the weekend under heavy security following a disaster prophecy by Asahara. Helicopters patrolled over Tokyo and 20,000 police watched over public transport, department stores, stadiums, airports and theatres in the city of 12 million people. Asahara said that on Saturday there would be a disaster worse than last January's Kobe earthquake in which 5,500 people died.

Winnie Mandela quits day before termination

SOWETO (AP) — Winnie Mandela announced she was resigning from her estranged husband's cabinet Monday, a day before her dismissal takes effect. Mrs. Mandela's decision, announced to reporters gathered at her Soweto home, could defuse tension between her and President Nelson Mandela. Mrs. Mandela said she was stepping down to pursue "more pressing" interests, including supporting Mr. Mandela's African National Congress. "I shall continue my duties as an ANC member of parliament," she said solemnly to dozens of foreign and local journalists. "As I have done in the past, I shall continue to give support and full attention to the needs of our people out on the ground." Mr. Mandela first fired his wife as deputy minister of arts, culture, science and technology on March 27, following her involvement in a string of embarrassing incidents. Mrs. Mandela went to court to challenge her firing, prompting the president to re-hire her just long enough to dress a second dismissal, announced Friday, in constitutional wrappings. The dismissal was to have become official Tuesday. Mrs. Mandela was replaced by human rights lawyer Brigitte Mabandla. Mrs. Mabandla said that she had gone to court "in furtherance of democracy in order to enforce proper behaviour from the highest office in the land" and demanded that reasons be given for her dismissal.

More Tajik rebels killed in clashes

DUSHANBE (R) — More Tajik rebels have been killed Sunday after refusing orders to go back. Separately, another Tajik rebel was shot dead as he tried to cross into Tajikistan near Khorog in the eastern region of Gorno-Badkhash — where fighting over the last 10 days has killed 41 Border Guards and hundreds of rebels — the spokesman said. There were no Border Guards casualties in the two clashes. The spokesman said Border Guards Command had obtained intelligence that rebel fighters planned an assault on border posts in the Khorog sector after regrouping. One rebel leader has died and one was wounded in the recent action. Rebel fighters based in Gorno-Badkhash have allied with Islamic militants operating out of bases in northern Afghanistan in their most effective joint action since losing a civil war two years ago in which thousands of people died. But Russian Border Guards Commander Anatoly Chechul said Sunday he had seen no evidence of a detachment of Islamic fighters said by opposition leaders to be heading towards Gorno-Badkhash from northern Afghanistan.

Kiev needs $45b to close Chernobyl

KIEV (R) — The head of Ukraine's nuclear power authority told the west bluntly Monday his country could not honour its pledge to close Chernobyl by the year 2000 without major financial help. Mikhail Umanets told a news conference the West would have to help come up with about $4.5 billion to close Chernobyl and build a replacement for the station, site of the world's worst nuclear accident on April 26, 1986. "The political decision (to close the station) is just a skeleton, though a good one," Mr. Umanets said after discussing the promise to close the facility with President Leonid Kuchma. "To put meat on it means resolving the technical issues, and the blood which will put it on its feet is financing. And everyone will have to sweat buckets to pull it off." Mr. Kuchma last week promised Ukraine would close Chernobyl within five years, provided the West helped. But he disclosed no figures on how much the operation would cost and a visiting European Union delegation pressing for its closure gave no guarantees on financing. A fire and explosion at the station's fourth reactor nine years ago sent a cloud of radiation across most of Europe and contaminated large swathes of Ukraine, Belarus and Russia. Mr. Umanets said Ukraine was to draw up a timetable by May 15 on closing the station, and said the West was to come up with a financing plan by July. "We believe that in July we will also see a financing programme. If we do not, we will consider our talks with the West as not serious," Mr. Umanets said. "I think the (European Union) delegation was aware when it left Ukraine that without money we cannot do anything." Energy-poor Ukraine had previously resisted pressure from the West to close Chernobyl by saying it needed the electricity provided by the plant's two working reactors — about five per cent of power produced in the country.

Mr. Umanets said Ukraine would insist on financing to build a new power station, possibly a gas-fired plant, and erect a new "tomb" over the station's stricken fourth reactor to replace the cracked original erected hastily after the disaster. Chernobyl's director, Sergei Parashin, last week proposed building a gas-fired plant and suggested 18 Western countries and Ukraine could each contribute about $200 million. Mr. Parashin told Monday's news conference Chernobyl's safety record was as good as Ukraine's other four nuclear power plants. He said his plant could function for many years if the West failed to come up with the financing. "The faster it is financed the faster we will close it. If the money comes through in three months, we'll close it in three months," Mr. Parashin said. "If they can't finance it at all, the station will keep working another 16 years."

14 Christian hostages die in Philippine carnage

ZAMBOANGA, Philippines (R) — Muslim extremists killed 14 Christian hostages in a violent orgy, mutilating and beheading some of them, while fleeing pursuing troops in the southern Philippines, a survivor said Monday. But the rebels spared one, a government engineer with whom army officers say one of the guerrillas has fallen in love. One other hostage escaped the mass execution carried out early Saturday by the fundamentalist Abu Sayyaf guerrillas, survivor Rustico Secundo told reporters. More than 2,000 soldiers have been pursuing the guerrillas in the mountainous Zamboanga peninsula since he band sacked the town of Ipi on April 4 and killed 53 mostly unarmed civilians. In Manila, President Fidel Ramos called a meeting of the National Security Council on Friday to discuss the threat from the Abu Sayyaf and intelligence reports that they were getting Russian-made weapons from Afghanistan. Mr. Secundo, taken to a Zamboanga hospital with slash wounds after being rescued by soldiers Sunday, said he overheard the guerrillas saying the hostages "had become extra baggage" and had to be killed to hasten their withdrawal. "I kept praying Psalm 23, 'the lord is my shepherd. I shall not want.' I kept repeating the prayer when they started hacking us," Mr. Secundo said of his mortally wounded companions: "I heard them calling their mother's names as they lay dying." Those killed had grown too weak to carry on after their captors forced them to act as porters, sometimes carrying their firearms or duffel bags filled with bundles of money the rebels looted from banks in Ipi, he said. The deaths brought to at least 20 the number of hostages killed since the start of the manhunt for the raiders. A survivor has alleged that one of them was a 14-year-old boy the guerrillas slaughtered before eating his flesh for lunch. Forty guerrillas have died in clashes with troops, the military said. About 200 rebels took part in the Ipi attack, seen as an escalation of fundamentalist violence in the southern islands, where various Muslim groups are fighting for autonomy. About half of the group escaped by sea while the rest retreated into the mountains. The army deployed extra troops in Pagadian and General Santos cities as well as in Sarangani province and other southern areas to ward off any further raids following sightings of boatloads of suspected Abu Sayyaf men. Brigadier-General Renato Garcia said. Police around Manila have been on the alert for a week in fear of guerrilla strikes in the city of 8.5 million people. "I saw how they beheaded (some of) my companions," Mr. Secundo told reporters. Hacked in the neck and backside, the 24-year-old farmer survived by playing dead and floating in a mangrove swamp until soldiers came. He said the lone woman with them, whom the rebels call "Jojo" was alive and had been taken away by the guerrillas. The military said an engineer of the Bureau of Public Highways, named Jocelyn Ortega, was the lone woman among the 37 hostages seized by the Ipi raiders as human shields. General Rene Cardones said one of the rebels had been personally taking care of Ms. Ortega and this could only mean he had fallen for her and "intends to marry her."

Going wide but not far

ISRAELI PRIME Minister Yitzhak Rabin got closer than ever to clearing the cobwebs from his vision for the future of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank when he told a U.S. news magazine Monday that he does not "believe that the whole land of Israel should be a Jewish state."

"It will not work. It will be Bosnia" Mr. Rabin went on to say.

The Israeli prime minister amplified his new thinking about the fate of the occupied territories by stating that he would like to see next to Israel a Palestinian entity in most or in considerable areas of the West Bank. As for Gaza Strip, Rabin appears to be supportive of his Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' earlier proposal to turn the Strip into a sovereign Palestinian state.

The Palestinian reaction to the suggestion that the Gaza Strip be the aspired to Palestinian state was understandably quick and blunt when the thought was rejected outright by the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) because it seems to cut off the Strip from the Palestinian hinterland. This rejection has to be justified since creating a mini Palestinian state in the troubled and beleaguered Gaza area can only be an attempt to divide the Palestinian territories and treat them differently, thereby prolonging and belabouring the process of settling the Palestinian problem. This is over and above the fact that the Strip is not viable for statehood geographically, economically or politically.

As for Rabin's futuristic outlook for the West Bank, we see trouble ahead over the full political import of a Palestinian entity that would be sanctioned there. To begin with, there are no clear precedents under international law. As far as we can detect, a political entity can only be conceived within the context of a federation or confederation and even then it will have to be a state as is the case in the U.S. or a province as is the case in the Canadian Federation. If Rabin seeks the creation of a hi-national country then he must be more forthcoming. Otherwise we see no way that a mere Palestinian entity deprived of all features of statehood can be seriously entertained as a final solution. Since both Rabin and Peres have gone to the length of spelling out their vision for the future of the Palestinian lands, they might as well go the extra mile in articulating a more coherent policy whose end result would bring about true and lasting peace.

ARABIC PRESS COMMENTARIES

CRITICISING AS insufficient the U.N. Security Council Resolution 986, which allowed Iraq to sell limited amounts of oil to buy food and medicine, a writer in Al Ra'i said that the Iraqi leadership has all the right to reject the resolution and demand that the sanctions be lifted altogether. Indeed, said Mahmoud Rimawi, the resolution did not reflect the desires of major powers, like France, Russia and China, which had lobbied for a total end to the embargo clamped on Iraq in 1990. Though the new resolution did not give the United Nations a mandate to handle the exports and left the whole matter to the Iraqi government, Baghdad has seen the resolution an infringement on its sovereignty, said the writer. But the new resolution, said the writer, should prompt the Iraqi government to intensify its diplomatic offensive at the pan-Arab and international levels to secure the complete lifting of the sanctions, which have been maintained so far largely due to America's influence on other nations.

DESCRIBING THE killing of three Arab youths in Hebron by Israeli security forces Sunday as a cold-blooded murder, Al Dustour daily said that the incident was bound to invite further counter attacks by the Palestinians and an escalation of the cycle of violence in the occupied territories. Killing the youths merely upon suspicion that they are wanted militants reflects Israel's total disregard to Arab lives and points to the fact that the Israeli authorities are determined to block all paths leading to security and peace, said the daily. Killing suspected people without ascertaining their real identity was a premeditated murder and a crime that can only add more obstacles in the path of peace, added the daily. What can Israel now expect from this murder, and the continued siege on the Palestinian people? asked the daily.

The View from Fourth Circle

University kids, tribalism and jamborees ancient and modern

THE LINGERING ramifications of the clashes between Circassian and Salti youths at the University of Jordan raise several key issues that have enormous implications for much larger questions of communal identity, nationhood and statehood in Jordan and the entire Middle East. Prime Minister Sherif Zeid Ben Shaker accurately pinpointed the bigger issue when he said last week that "national unity and the rule of law remain among the major priorities of the government at a time when efforts are being exerted towards constructing a modern state."

National unity, the rule of law and constructing a modern state are huge components of the contemporary Jordanian experience, but they are not the total picture. The key other element that remains unaddressed is that of tribalism and tribal identity. We should not refrain from addressing it, because it remains absolutely crucial to our prospects of developing viable, stable and durable modern Arab states.

Tribalism is central to this issue, as evidence by the dramatic manner in which the prime minister himself set out to resolve the problem by meeting with tribal leaders from both parties to the clashes at the university. He was correct to do so, and both parties ratified his approach by indicating their desire to resolve the problem through traditional tribal means of conflict-resolution. As such, tribalism is both part of the problem that surfaced at the university, but also part of the solution.

The challenge of building a modern state that is based on respect for the rule of law requires that we approach this matter with clear recognition of the tribal nature of our society. Many people, especially those influenced by and enamored with Western brands of statehood, view tribalism as a negative, old-fashioned mode of social configuration. I think this is a mistaken view.

Tribalism is a social and even a national reality that has defined our region of the world for thousands of years. The durability of tribalism reflects its relevance to the majority of people in two key aspects of their lives: It satisfactorily manifests their human identity, and it assures them the sort of personal and communal well-being that people in the Western industrialised states obtain from the legal guarantees of their constitutions and laws.

Tribalism in our lands is having to coexist with the more modern systems of laws and centralised state power that are a direct consequence of the post-colonial experience of independent statehood. The reality that has defined our lands for thousands of years is that tribalism has usually coexisted with "statehood," "nationalism" and other large national configurations. Tribalism and productive, durable states are not necessarily mutually exclusive. The key is to reconcile the two in a manner that does not ravage or ignore the tribal reality.

The most common "national" configuration throughout Middle Eastern history has been that of the tribal confederacy. The configuration has worked because it successfully bridges the space between individual tribal identity and the larger imperative of national bulk (or what the technocrats would call today "economies of scale").

The fact that a clash between students at a university in Jordan should need to be resolved through traditional tribal means in the closing years of the second millennium AD—about eight thousand years after tribalism was born with the advent of the settled village and its grazing and cultivated lands—suggests that a) kids will be kids, b) tribes remain powerful components of our identity, and, c) modern statehood should take note of both a) and b) if the challenge of building a sustainable state based on laws is to be successfully met.

The modern political structures that we imported from the former Western colonial powers have not worked very well in most Arab countries. In Jordan, it is interesting to note that continued democratisation and liberalisation have both tended to promote greater tribalism, as evidenced by the results of the 1993 elections. In Arab countries that collapsed or were plunged into violent warfare, such as Lebanon, Yemen and Somalia, we also see tribalism emerging as the preferred means of survival. So, the lesson, much as many amongst us may wish to avoid it, is: Whether through orderly democratisation or domestic national incoherence, Arab culture will inevitably gravitate to tribalism as the dominant, authentic and time-tested form of national configuration.

We should accept this reality and try to build upon it, instead of trying to avoid it. Tribalism is not shameful or primitive, but it is traditional and pre-modern. The real test we face is how to modernise tribalism, so that it achieves two important goals: a) to absorb some of the principles of late 18th century North Atlantic republicanism that were devised in France and the United States, and that many Arabs seem to like, and, b) to adapt to the reality that Arab society today, unlike its many historical antecedents, is predominantly urban, centrally politically controlled at home, and subjugated by and often dependent upon Western political and economic power.

In Jordan's case, it is also interesting to note that the really successful institutions are the ancient indigenous ones, such as family, tribe, monarchy, and a general patriarchal mode that requires, for instance, the return of the prime minister to resolve a clash between students at a leading university. This is intriguing, but not necessarily negative.

The parallel important question is: If we are trying to build a modern state based on the rule of law—a good goal, we all agree—why was the rule of law not used in the University of Jordan case to identify the trouble makers or guilty parties and send them before a court of law?

The answer, much as some people may not like it, or may wish to deny it, is: Because tribalism is a more effective, credible and merciful means of conflict-resolution than the modern legal system in Jordan in the closing years of the second millennium AD.

An interesting, if awkward, question arises: Had these clashes taken place between, say, Egyptian farm workers and Sri Lankan maids, would the dispute have had to await the return of the prime minister, or would the authorities have quickly applied the rule of law?

I suspect that if we put some of our best legal, political and tribal minds to it, we could probably come up with a formula that successfully modernises tribalism and gives it coherent political expression, within a model of statehood that honours national unity without totally demolishing the tribal unity that is so much older and stronger than the modern Euro-style state. Why are we so mesmerised by the secular republicanism jamboree that took place along the North Atlantic rim about two and a quarter centuries ago, to the extent that we ignore ancient and rather nifty systems of national configuration that have responded to most of our indigenous needs for most of the known history of settled human history on earth?

The key to resolving this issue perhaps might be found within the underlying sentiment that sparked the university clashes: Honour. The tribal confederacies of old worked because they assured people's material and emotional needs; they generated pasturage, water and wheat fields, along with a sense of dignity that came from the collective recognition of the identity and rights of the tribe. Transgressions by individuals were resolved through the collectivity of the entire tribe. Honour was preserved. Peace usually prevailed.

Perhaps honour itself is a silly concept to have to deal with. That, however, is not easily resolved by mortals. We may not be able to eliminate honour as a passionate instigator of social actions. We can, however, temper it with coherent social relationships and rational national configurations, even in the post-colonial Arab World. To do so, we will have to do two things that we have not done to date, due to our enchantment with the smells that come out of the kitchens of colonial heartlands: We will have to stop simplistically copying Western political systems and structures, and we will have to appreciate the constructive aspects of many of our ancient ways that can be modernised for today's world.

Perhaps the professors and students at the University of Jordan could hold a conference on the subject, to show us the way forward to a more enlightened future. This, after all, is the role of a university—to engage in energetic, honest discussion of new ideas, in order to seek the truth, and to forge a better society that is based on self-evident, indigenous truths that dignify human beings and institutionalise merciful conflict-resolution in order to preserve social peace. It's also the role of a modern state based on laws. It's also what tribalism has done for thousands of years. Somewhere in there, one suspects, is a modern nation-building jamboree waiting to take place.

Policies of aggression

By G. H. Jansen

IS THE U.S. gearing up for a second military adventure in the Middle East? A repeat of "Desert Shield" and "Desert Storm"? This question is prompted by the steady and increasing drum-roll of U.S. propaganda against not just Iraq but now also against Iran and Libya. The latest example was the speech made by U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher to a Jewish group in Washington on Tuesday, April 4, in which he referred to Iraq and Iran as "those who rogue state." He also expressed opposition to Iran's plans to increase its military strength and against any relaxation of U.N. sanctions against Iraq.

Earlier on that same day, the secretary of state had inaccurately claimed that the U.S. had evidence that Iraq was trying to build up its biological weapons "for offensive purposes." President Bill Clinton himself had to set the record straight—that the U.S. "evidence" referred to the past and not to the present. A few days earlier Washington had accused Iran of placing biological weapons on islands in the mouth of the Straits of Hormuz, thus, it was claimed, endangering the world supply of oil passing through the Straits. And then the president banned the U.S. oil company, Conoco, from proceeding with a contract to export oil from Iranian oilfields that it has developed. Reports from Washington claim that this could be the start of a U.S. campaign to ban all economic relations with Iran.

In the past month the U.S. put a strain on its relations with Russia, when it vigorously, publicly, but unsuccessfully, attempted to get Russia not to sell nuclear reactors to Iran.

As with U.N. sanctions against Iraq the U.S. opposes the lifting of sanctions against Libya because of its refusal to hand over two Libyans accused of being responsible for the Lockerbie plane bombing.

The important point is that the evidence of Iranian weapons in the Strait of Hormuz, based entirely on satellite photos, and on the involvement of the two Libyans, is extremely shaky and the fact that the U.S. is basing its hate campaign on such evidence is itself evidence that the U.S. is determined to press its case against these countries, with or without reason and come what may.

Already there are vague hints of military action against Iraq, even before the latest wave of threats of forcible action to rescue the two American intelligence operatives imprisoned in Iraq for illegally crossing the frontier from Kuwait.

What could be the possible motivation for this extended campaign of demonisation against these three countries? U.S. analysts have provided two answers, both unsatisfactory: to preempt any weakening of the U.N. sanctions against Iraq and Libya, and to "throttle" the Iranian economy as Iran tries to rebuild its military capability.

But those "reasons" merely take the questions back to another layer of questioning. Why should the U.S. follow such a vindictive and punitive policy against these three countries? What have Iran, Iraq and Libya done to hurt any of America's national interests in the Middle East?

The surprising answer is "nothing." Support to "terrorist" groups and "opposition to Israeli-Arab peace," which are the reasons given by Washington, do not directly impinge on any U.S. national interest.

But they do impinge directly on the interests of Israel which, through American Zionist groups, now directs U.S. policy in the region.

Thus, Iran's development of its military strength is no conceivable threat to the U.S., nor is Iraq's possible development of a germ bomb. But these countries are threats to Israel.

During "Desert Storm" Iraq fired half a dozen inaccurate "Scud" missiles at Israel which, with conventional warheads, killed only a hand-full of Israelis. But what if the missiles were of a later more accurate model and were tipped with a weapon of mass destruction as warheads?

The anti-Libyan motivation is different from the Iraq-Iran one. Libya is no military threat to Israel but Colonel Muammar Qadhafi's defiant and independent stance on the Lockerbie suspects is just one manifestation of how he challenges the dominant and domineering position in the whole area that the U.S. "enjoys" and to which Israel aspires, on its own and in its own right. So Libya has to be chastened and brought to heel.

This is what Warren Christopher means when he talks about "rogue states." For "rogue" read "independent." On the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, India is a "rogue state." As is Pakistan. Egypt is trying to qualify its signature and Syria has refused to sign unless Israel—the real regional "rogue"—which both refuses to accede and has a stockpile of 200 nuclear bombs—does as well.

But demonstration can be counterproductive if the U.S. goes on persecuting Iraq even after Baghdad has ceased to be any threat to its neighbours, which is the routine accusation, made against the country.

The Israeli/U.S. alarm and despondency about Iran's nuclear "threat" is merely preemptive and precautionary because Israeli nuclear weapons experts admit—openly—that it would take around 10 years for Iran to produce a weapon with a delivery system.

The U.S. is in danger of talking itself into a position where it has to do something drastic against an enemy—who is not really an enemy of the U.S.—but whom the U.S. public has been conditioned, brainwashed, into thinking of as not merely an enemy but as a dangerous and treacherous foe.

Philippine religious passions turn to politics

By Alistair McIntosh

Reuter

MANILA — The Philippines' exuberant and often bloody display of Easter religious fervour ended on Sunday to be replaced by election politics, an equally bloody and no less consuming passion.

Appropriately for Asia's only Christian nation, political analysts make liberal use of biblical metaphor in looking ahead to legislative and local government elections on May 8.

Nobody normally dies in the crucifixion reenactments and flagellations that mark the Thursday-to-Sunday Easter celebration in the Philippines.

But at least half a dozen people have died so far in the violence that traditionally accompanies Philippine elections.

Newspaper columnists and editorial writers draw parallels between Christ's sufferings on the cross and those of the Filipino people at the hands of politicians who lie and cheat with such abandon they could make a pharisee blush.

Others see brotherhood between the temple priests who bribed Judas Iscariot into betraying Jesus and Filipino officials who will do anything to ensure pro-government candidates get elected.

Less depressingly, others see in the resurrection the Filipino ability to bounce back from natural catastrophe, political upheaval and diplomatic setbacks—a track record of recent history that led one Manila headline writer to ask, "are we a nation of losers?"

More prosaically, others regard the polls as a referendum on President Fidel Ramos, the first Protestant leader in this overwhelmingly Roman Catholic nation of 65 million people.

Mr. Ramos, halfway through the single six-year term allowed by the constitution, needs election success for his ruling party candidates to ensure the economic reforms to which he is committed are not thwarted by the senate and congress.

Despite his achievements in bringing the Philippines from zero to more than five per cent gross national product growth, analysts say Mr. Ramos is beset by a series of problems over which he has little control. "No government in the post-war republic has been assailed simultaneously by so many domestic and foreign policy issues as the Ramos administration," wrote veteran columnist Amado Doronila in top-selling daily Inquirer on Sunday.

"Ramos is dog-paddling in a sea of troubles," wrote the more acerbic Max Soliven in the Philippine Star.

Top of the list is Singapore's execution of Filipina maid Flor Contemplacion last month after repeated pleas for a stay of execution—including two personal appeals from Mr. Ramos.

The hanging of a woman many Filipinos believe was innocent despite her repeated confessions has inflamed people who see her as a symbol of the more than four million Filipinos forced to seek work overseas because of poverty at home.

Next comes what Mr. Doronila described as "China's creeping territorial expansion" in the South China Sea's spratly islands at the expense of Philippine claims.

Diplomats and political analysts say China has deliberately picked the Philippines, perceived as militarily the weakest of the Southeast Asian nations with competing claims in the Spratlys, to test the region's resolve.

China dismisses all rival claims to the disputed South China Sea islands and rejects multilateral negotiations.

The third crisis is a sudden and brutal eruption of Islamic extremist violence in the southern Philippines by a group

Analysts credit Mr. Ramos, a former forces chief, with responding firmly on all three fronts. Will the voters agree? "This is a powder keg," commented the head of a leading Manila public relations firm. "Anything can happen."

Problems facing Gazan students in the West Bank

By Nigel Parry

DURING THE first term of Bir Zeit University's 1994-95 academic year, over a third of its 350 students from Gaza were not granted permission to attend classes. Half way through the term, Israel agreed to grant nearly three quarters of these students permission to study if they signed a declaration saying they supported the current peace process. They were to be "guinea pigs," their behaviour determining when the other 1,300 students from the Gaza Strip in higher education in the West Bank would be granted permits, according to a letter from Yitzhak Rabin, in his capacity as defence minister, to Al Haq on Dec. 13.

With the peace negotiations seemingly hopelessly stalled, Gazan students' right to study in West Bank institutions has come to be used by Israel as a bargaining chip for the far higher and more tangible stakes of land, settlements and security. The students themselves, real people with real hopes and aspirations, a fact almost too obvious to state but one that either has evaded or does not concern the Israelis in the least, are trapped in a difficult situation. With 8,000 teenagers finishing secondary school in Gaza each year, a figure five times greater than the capacity of the Strip's two tertiary institutions, access to higher education in the West Bank is a necessity for these people.

Restricted movements

Since the killing of an Israeli teenager in a suburb of Tel Aviv in May 1992, there have been severe restrictions on Palestinians' movement in and out of the Gaza Strip. Gazan students must now hold concurrently no less than three separate permits, each with its own separate application procedure, in order to pursue higher education in the West Bank. The first, a magnetic identity card necessary for leaving the Strip, allows Israel to track by computer the exact dates an individual exits and reenters. The second permit is necessary for travel through the part of Israel between the Strip and the West Bank, and will only be granted to students who sign the aforementioned "oath of loyalty" to the peace process. Usually valid for only two days, it must be followed by the third permit allowing residence in the West Bank. As if the application procedure for the three were not bad enough, with a minimum of 22 hours standing in line usually required, each permit can only be issued on condition that the student passes a "security" check. And the granting of one permit does not guarantee the issuing of the rest. Although the academic term generally runs for four months, the residence permit is usually only valid for three months and its renewal is far from automatic.

The process is characterised, above all, by its arbitrary nature. Students, refused several successive applications on "security grounds" may unexpectedly be granted a permit and permits are often refused to students with no record of security offences. Valid permits are often confiscated by soldiers at checkpoints or cancelled en masse in the wake of "security" incidents when Israel seizes off the occupied territories.

For those who fall foul of this labyrinth, there is no educational alternative in Gaza, which boasts an unemployment rate of 45 per cent. Israel's policy frightens students into staying in the West Bank during university holidays in case they cannot get back to their studies. For students who are denied permits, refused extensions or have their permit invalidated through a blanket cancellation, the inducement to carry out their education without consent from Israel is great. In order to get out of Gaza, students hang onto the axles of lorries or hide in trucks carrying fruit and other goods, swim around the border into Israel, or bluff their way across the quieter border points using Egyptian identity documents. Students already at the university travel to and from their homes nervously avoiding checkpoints. Such students are considered by Israel as illegally continuing their education and are therefore in danger of detention, large fines and, in some cases, even torture. Three large-scale night raids on Gazan students' accommodation took place in 1994.

Albert Aghazarian, the director of public relations at Bir Zeit, believes that Israel intentionally makes use of the students' tenuous status in the West Bank to target and manipulate individuals it wishes to harass or use for its own ends. A recent publication of the Human Rights Action Project (HRAP) at Bir Zeit entitled Making Education Illegal — Students from the Gaza Strip, the most comprehensive report on the issue to date, includes the case of a Bir Zeit student called Faisal that illustrates this conclusion. Faisal was arrested on his way home from the university in the wake of the blanket cancellation of permits following the Oct. 19 bus bombing in Tel Aviv. Despite the immediate intervention of university officials at the scene, Faisal was taken to the interrogation wing of Ramallah Prison to be interrogated by agents of Shin Bet. He had been arrested, fined and deported to Gaza for a permit violation earlier in the year.

The agenda of the Shin Bet officers was to recruit Faisal as a collaborator, providing them with information about political activity and activists at the university. They offered money and permits to study if he agreed. When he refused, the officers called up his file on the computer and threatened to rape his mother and sister. He was beaten until his arm broke and one of his eardrums was damaged. The senior Shin Bet officer commanded the others to leave the room and took out his gun. While removing all the bullets except one, he said: "You only have one choice to work with us. If you don't I will kill you." Showing Faisal the remaining bullet, he closed the chamber and spun it, telling him: "You have three seconds to agree to work for us. Do you want to pray before you die?" Counting to three, the commander pointed the gun at his head and pulled the trigger, but the gun clicked on an empty chamber. Repeating his threats, he pulled the trigger again with the same result.

Faisal was eventually fined and released, having his magnetic identity card confiscated, on condition that he return to Gaza. But the severity of his injuries necessitated medical treatment, which delayed him for a few days, after which he decided to remain in West Bank to complete his studies. His house was raided about a month later, and even though he had been sleeping on the roof to avoid detection, he was discovered and deported back to Gaza on condition that he withdrew a complaint he had filed against the Shin Bet.

Disinformation

Organisations that protest the denial of education to a desperate population come up against the widespread disinformation that Israel releases to cloud this issue. In April-May 1994, London-based Friends of Bir Zeit University (FBZU) launched a campaign on behalf of Gazan students. At the end of June the Israeli embassy's standard response to enquiries was to blame the new Palestine National Authority (PNA) for any problems with permits. In fact the systematic and widespread denial of permits had nothing to do with the PNA as Israel had retained the power to grant or deny them. Throughout the year, Israeli disinformation to individuals and MPs writing in protest continued. On Nov. 3, London Ambassador Moshé Raviv, writing in response to a question raised by Mike Watson, about the fate of 29 Bir Zeit students arrested in April, claimed "these students have since returned to their studies with valid permits". Yet no permits had been issued to any Gazan students since the Tel Aviv bus bombing of Oct. 19, and were not issued to some until Dec. 7, one month later. After consulting with the Israeli prime minister's office on Dec. 22, Foreign Office representative Guy Pollard joyfully told FBZU that "students in Gaza wishing to pursue studies in the West Bank would now be free to do so." Yet Mr. Rabin's office had issued a statement to Al Haq a fortnight earlier outlining the new "loyalty oath."

Bosnian army gaining battlefield credibility

By Kurt Schork

SARAJEVO — The Muslim-led Bosnian government army has emerged from three years of war as a credible fighting force capable of punishing separatist Serbs on a number of fronts, according to U.N. military officers. To do so, it has overcome the handicaps of a U.N. arms embargo and the fact that it had to be built from scratch when fighting began in 1992. "The Bosnian army is much better trained and equipped and they seem to have learned not to over-extend themselves," said a senior U.N. officer who asked not to be named. "Because of their relative lack of armour and artillery they don't have the ability to concentrate attacks and decisively defeat their enemy. But they are chipping away at the Serbs and defending the ground they take."

Recent television pictures of fighting on Mount Vlasica, where the army captured a communications tower from the Serbs, stirred Bosnian Muslims like as they want through peaceful, democratic means, but not through the use of violence. PLO officials and members of Islamic Jihad said they, too, were in contact on the same issue. A leading Hamas figure said last week that Hamas would consider suspending attacks in and from self-rule areas if the PNA ensured it was part of what he called "the decision-making process."

Hamas spokesman

no other footage of the war. Gone are the days of embarrassing propaganda films on government television showing Bosnian soldiers in tennis shoes and ill-matched uniforms storming buildings in mock actions. The Vlasica pictures showed a well-equipped army using tanks and artillery in deep snow on rugged terrain, seizing and defending an objective which had long eluded their grasp. "We have gone from the defensive to the offensive," explained Bosnian army Brigadier General Jovan Divjak. "Vlasica was a significant victory over a much superior aggressor under very difficult weather conditions."

Bosnia had no army when it gained independence from the former Yugoslavia in 1992. It was immediately set upon by Serb forces intent upon dismembering the new nation. Gangsters, policemen and shopkeepers manned barricades in Sarajevo, fending off Serb tanks with rifles and shotguns. The arms embargo made little difference to Bosnian Serbs who got armour, artillery and ammunition from Belgrade. But for the Bosnian government, which had made little preparation for war, the embargo was nearly a death sentence. By the end of 1992 Bosnian Serbs had overrun 70 per cent of the country and besieged most of the Muslim population in major cities like Sarajevo and a few rural enclaves. Croats in western Bosnia and neighbouring Croatia, nominal allies in the government fight against Serbs, regularly blocked and pilfered illegal arms shipments bound for Sarajevo forces. Bosnian Muslims and Croats fought their own war in central Bosnia in 1993 until the United States brokered a ceasefire in the spring of 1994 and persuaded them to form a federation. The federation agreement opened supply routes for light arms, ammunition and anti-tank weapons into central Bosnia, where the most active battlefields lay. Formerly rag-tag units began taking the field in full uniform with flak jackets, battle helmets, sleeping bags, spare boots, guns, ammunition and radios. The Bosnian army ended 1994 by capturing Kupres in the centre of the country and taking key high ground known as the Cerniska Planina north of Sarajevo. The army has used a winter truce to train and equip itself for renewed offensives when a current truce ends on May 1. "The real limitation on our army now is the lack of heavy weapons caused by the arms embargo," said General Divjak. "We are trying to pull ourselves out of that hole by capturing weapons and producing some. We buy a few weapons, but the embargo is the limit to our greater success."

Despite the truce, government troops have already launched offensives on Vlasica and, further east, around Tuzla. "Bosnian army morale is excellent but the Serbs haven't really responded yet and government troops are yet to be tested in 1995," said a U.N. official who asked not to be named.

Chechens caned at first trial under Sharia law

By Isabella Astigarraga
Agence France Presse

VEDENO, Russia — The 27 men lined up on the platform in the mosque Thursday, grinning sheepishly and trying not to look at the crowd that had come to witness their trial and punishment by Chechnya's first Islamic court. The 27 had been arrested for being drunk and disorderly in the streets of Vedeno, a hill town about 60 kilometres southeast of the Chechen capital Grozny. They knew what to expect as they eyed the canes lying on a table beside the Koran. The "trial" was a mere formality, since the defendants were caught in the act. The presiding imam explained that under the "Islamic constitution" introduced a month ago by Chechen separatist leaders, their offence was punishable by 40 strokes of the cane.

The atmosphere was light-hearted enough as the first man came forward to take his punishment. He took off his jacket and lay down on the table face down. The "executioner" — a young man in jeans and a leather jacket — lifted the cane hesitantly, clearly reluctant to inflict the punishment on his victim. As he wavered with arm upraised, the offender turned and told him impatiently to "get on with it." The 100 or so spectators burst out laughing. The blows, 30 on the buttocks and 10 on the shoulders were dealt relatively lightly for the first of the condemned men. Some attempted to turn the whole exercise into a kind of sporting event by jumping briskly off the table when the punishment was over. Gradually however the tone of the proceedings changed. The blows became harder and the atmosphere changed. At one point, as one of the prisoners moved to the table, a man in battledress stood up at the back of the courtroom and shouted something. He walked to the front and banded over his Kalashnikov assault rifle to another soldier, then seized the cane. "It's his brother," a spectator confided. In all, seven or eight brothers or cousins asked to mete out the punishment on their relative themselves. Ilias, another spectator said those prisoners were "lucky" because in this close-knit community their shame is thus mitigated. "The blows are nothing at all. The worst is the shame. It is better to be hit by a member of the family," Ilias said. Most of the prisoners took their punishment without flinching. One even offered to take a double dose, in place of a man who he said was sick. But as they filed out of the courtroom, all the men averted their gaze and the spectators looked away in embarrassment. Of the 27, only one man protested the punishment. "I am 65 and all my life I have never done a wrong thing to anyone. You are youngsters, you owe me respect," he yelled at the imam and the young men trying to restrain him. Finally, two of his nephews managed to put him on the table and held him down while the cane was applied. There was strong support for this new form of justice among the spectators in the court and the people of Vedeno, where the separatists have set up their new headquarters. But many were keen to stress that Chechnya was not about to become a Caucasian Saudi Arabia. "We don't want to stop people drinking, we just want to punish those who get drunk in the streets every night and who shame everyone and molest the women," said Sultan, 30. He himself readily admitted drinking a glass of alcohol from time to time "but not in public." There were people in Vedeno who wanted to apply the Sharia in all its rigour, notably for criminals. They recalled wistfully the Soviet era when, as one noted, "you could walk about at night and there were no thieves." The majority however said Islamic law was not part of tradition in Chechnya where the people practise Sufism, form of Islam. As to the 27 caned on Thursday, Sultan said it was unlikely they would become teetotalers as a result. He said they would "certainly not be deterred from drinking. Only now they'll be more careful not to get caught."

Former communists make comeback in Eastern Europe

By Mark J. Porubcansky

KOSICE, Slovakia — Frustrated by bad roads, rickety buses, polluting factories and other urban woes, voters in Slovakia's second-largest city looked for a mayor with experience. They chose a former communist. The political comeback last fall of Rudolf Schuster, who ran this city of 250,000 people during the 1980s before the collapse of communism, is far from unique. Five years ago, millions of average people throughout the Soviet bloc rose up to junk a system foundering on mediocrity. Now, they are using their freedom to invite back the only people with real governing experience. Today, one-time communists voice support for political pluralism and market economics. Pragmatists like Mr. Schuster, who accepted communism less out of ideological conviction than from a lack of alternatives, find the adjustment easiest. But some retain old habits and a constituency that remains focused on social equality. It is unclear whether they can apply yesterday's experience to today's problems. Reformed communist parties have won majorities in Hungary, Bulgaria and Lithuania. One-time apparatchiks are entrenched in varying degrees in Romania, Moldova, Slovakia, Poland and Latvia and all of enough communist to be named chairman of Slovakia's first post-Marxist regional parliament and the Czechoslovak ambassador to Canada before the federation split into two countries in 1993. Even in the era of stifling communist bureaucracy, he had a reputation as a man with the common touch. His time in Canada reinforced his appreciation for practical local politics, he said. Few people in Eastern Europe would go back to the strictures of communism, so why react the people who enforced them? Some say former communists are among the most able managers. "These are ambitious, smart people whose only chance to excel in those times was as communist party leaders," said 60-year-old Nadezhda Bespalova in Moldova, a former Soviet republic. Ladislav Falat, who ran Mr. Schuster's comeback campaign and now is an official with Slovakia's anti-monopoly agency, said whatever its faults, the communist system trained party members as administrators. "Those who were not in the party are like athletes who were never trained," he said. Elsewhere in the region, voters have turned to former communists to escape nationalism or political bickering, or to ease the pain of economic transition.

Once in power, the former communists must juggle demands for a social safety net and the need to pursue tight money and tough reform. Hungary's Socialist Party, renamed former communists, swept to power last year behind Gyula Horn, the foreign minister who opened the iron curtain in 1989. Voters looked to the socialists to end the drift of an inexperienced centre-right government. But they are saddled with political squabbles and an economic mess. Respected Finance Minister Laszlo Bekesi quit in January in a dispute with Mr. Horn about the pace of reform. Mr. Bekesi wanted to go fast; Mr. Horn was concerned about protecting a loyal constituency. Bulgaria's 35-year-old socialist Prime Minister, Zhan Videnov, was elected in December to end five years of parliamentary gridlock, but faces similar challenges. Ognian Minchev, a political analyst in Bulgaria, predicts Mr. Videnov will struggle with old-style communist thinking in the party's rank and file. "In some places, the old Marxists never left. Romanian President Ion Iliescu, a former communist minister, took power after Nicolae Ceausescu was deposed and bas-shielded Romanians from extensive market reforms. Romanians elected him in 1990 and 1992, and polls suggest he would win again in 1996."

PNA, Hamas meet on attacks

Mahmoud Al Zahar told the newspaper Al Quds that any decision to halt attacks would have to come from the Hamas military wing, Izzeddin Al Qassam. Dr. Zahar could not be reached for comment, but one PLO official interpreted this as a "positive development because it did not mean he totally rejected halting attacks."

In Gaza a military court sentenced a Hamas supporter to seven years in jail after convicting him of helping transport explosives to Israel, Palestinian Prosecutor General Khaled Al Kidra said on Monday. Mohammad Al Simri, 29, was the third Hamas man sent to jail in two days by the PNA. The authority has also jailed three men from Islamic Jihad, one of them for life. Palestinian sources said Simri was detained last month apparently on a tip from Israel that he helped Hamas smuggle a truck laden with explosives into Israel.

began beating about 20 of them with gun butts and sticks. Soldiers dragged several women by the hair. The incident led to stone throwing by Palestinian youths but soldiers held their fire. There were no injuries in the incident. Soldiers detained at least 13 people, including some prominent leaders of Mr. Arafat's Fateh movement in Ramallah, witnesses said.

Yen as key world currency faces many obstacles

TOKYO (AFP) — Japan's desire to bolster the yen as a key world currency faces many obstacles, including the huge yen debt held by many Asian nations and the U.S. dollar's entrenched position in world trade, analysts said Monday.

"Malaysia, for example, has a huge yen debt. The last thing I think they want to do is take on more yen," said Betsy Daniels, a banking analyst with Morgan Stanley in Tokyo.

The yen has risen 17 per cent in value against the dollar since the beginning of the year, increasing the costs of repayment for Asian countries who hold loans from Japanese banks.

Since many of these countries use dollars in their international trade, such as China, Thailand and Indonesia, this raises their repayment costs.

The Japanese government has so far said it will do nothing to ease Asian countries' debt burden, which has reached more than $6 billion. Tokyo has raised the idea of bolstering the yen as a key world currency to match the country's economic ascension and counter the effects of the falling dollar, which has dramatically boosted the price of Japanese exports.

Takafumi Kaneko, a deputy director of Japan's Economic Planning Agency, said Friday that Japan wanted to develop "intimate relations with Asian central banks" to develop the yen as a key international currency.

He cited U.S. economic decline and the lack of support for the dollar as a major reason.

This presumably means Japan would like more Asian central banks to hold their current accounts in yen and for business transactions to be conducted in yen.

But Dick Beason, an economist with James Capel in Tokyo, said this all points to maintaining the yen as a strong currency, which is not the effect that the Japanese government should be striving for at this time.

"I don't think this has been very well thought out," Mr. Beason said. "This is not the policy the Japanese government should be pursuing now."

For the yen to take on the stature of a key trading currency, Asian countries have to be able to sell more of their products in Japan, which would in turn put more yen in their pockets, Ms. Daniels said.

She said one reason the dollar dominated is that the United States represented one of the biggest markets for developing Asian countries, which was not the case with Japan.

"Japan has to open its doors to imports so these countries can earn the yen to repay their debts," Ms. Daniels said.

Malaysia and Thailand conduct about 40 per cent of their trade with Japan, but only about 20 per cent of their currency reserves are in yen, she said. Much of their currency reserves remain in dollars.

"The dollar is still far more comfortably accepted," said Mark Faulkner, an analyst with S.G. Warburg securities. "The yen is really not in a position to take over the dollar's position, not even in its own backyard."

Another reason the dollar is so entrenched in Asia is that the currencies in Hong Kong, Malaysia and Thailand, among others, are linked to the greenback in one way or another.

The analysts agree that the dollar may eventually be knocked off its throne, but it will require some major restructuring of the way international business is conducted.

The dollar remains the foremost currency for the

IFO: Yen to maintain strength in medium term

MUNICH (AFP) — The yen is to maintain its strong position over the medium term, particularly against the dollar, and this will have a profound effect on the Japanese economy, the Munich-based IFO institute said in a report published here Tuesday.

The institute forecast lower growth for Japan, whose GDP rose 0.6 per cent last year over 1993, calculating the rate would slide 0.5 percentage points for every 10 yen the currency was overvalued against the dollar.

It added that Japanese industry had reacted to lower competitiveness resulting from the strength of the yen by transferring some production to neighbouring Asian states "where salaries are lower."

IFO estimates the high costs associated with German industry, which had cost it its competitive edge last year, had now "almost entirely disappeared," considerably boosting German exporters' chances in Japan.

The institute added that because of the yen's overvaluation, conditions for German firms looking to move into Japan have become much improved. It said medium-sized firms should seize the moment to develop links with Japanese partners.

IFO researchers added that the Japanese economy now found itself in a structural crisis as it struggled to overcome the deepest and longest recession since the war and identified political change and deregulation as necessary to effect a turnaround.

But they warned it was too early to speak of the "end of the Japanese era" as the Japanese were likely to be able to react flexibly to the new situation.

buying and selling of petroleum, which Ms. Betsy says "is what greases the wheels of the world economy."

What may happen is that certain currencies may dominate in regions of the world, as is the case with the German mark in Europe, particularly in former communist block nations, where the dollar has become the currency of second choice.

"In the next five years, we should start seeing a more strongly entrenched yen trading bloc," Ms. Betsy said. "We do expect greater imports from Japan."

Meanwhile, traders turned their backs on a plan to stimulate the Japanese economy, and reacted to action at a meeting of finance ministers in Bali, by driving the dollar down Monday and warning it could go farther.

Dealers reported "heavy" intervention to support the dollar by the Bank of Japan, a day after Japan and the United States had been unable to announce concrete steps to stabilise foreign exchange rates during talks at a meeting of Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) finance ministers in Bali.

Japanese officials asked the markets for patience to let the package of "emergency economic measures," unveiled Friday to counter the rise of the yen, take effect.

"At the moment, the market is giving low marks to it. But when supplementary budget and import-promoting tax measures take shape, the market's recognition will change," Japanese Finance Minister Masayoshi Takemura was quoted by Jiji Press as saying in Bali Monday.

The U.S. currency fell against the yen despite a decision by the Bank of Japan to cut its discount rate from 1.75 per cent to 0.75 per cent on Friday, dealers said.

The dollar was quoted at 82.15-20 yen in evening trading on the Tokyo foreign exchange market, down from the previous business day's 82.32-34 yen here.

"As expected, (Friday's economic) package had nothing new," a chief dealer with a Japanese city bank said. "The outcome of the APEC forum at the weekend seems to be the factor that pushed the yen up again."

Dealers warned that the U.S. currency might break a record low price of 80.15 yen, marked last week because there were few factors to support the dollar in the short term.

"It is no wonder that the dollar falls below 80 yen sometimes this week," Hijiiri Fujiwara, a dealer at Daiwa Bank Ltd., said. "The dollar may touch 79 yen or even 78 yen if selling pressure surges to a considerable point."

Dealers also said the discount rate cut to a record low of one per cent did not appear to affect the market because the cut of 0.75 percentage point was within expectations.

"If the Bank of Japan lowered interest rates by one percentage point instead, of 0.75 percentage point, the yen might have been lower (against the dollar)," another dealer said.

Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama, brushing aside fears of a further surge in the Japanese currency, said his government was ready to do everything possible to stem the rising yen.

"As for Japan, we will take all kinds of measures to stabilise the international currency market, while taking a coordinated global action," Mr. Murayama said.

"I believe (the United States) will reveal steps shortly (to defend the dollar)," Mr. Murayama said, adding that Tokyo and Washington "have confirmed the need to stabilise exchange rates."

Chief cabinet secretary Kozo Igarashi, speaking at a news conference here, said Monday that Japan and the United States had "agreed to take timely and appropriate action in the market" to counter the rise of the yen.

Mr. Igarashi stressed that Japan was committed to implement faithfully the economic package announced Friday.

"It is most important that we implement the latest package," Mr. Igarashi said. Share prices rose Monday on a bargain-hunting and futures-led buying, although market players were disappointed at the package, brokers said.

"The government package announced last Friday didn't meet market expectations," a Japanese broker said, adding that most players said the impact of the measures was "extremely" limited.

The Nikkei stock average of 225 issues rose by 256.26 points to close at 16,304.15 points following a 2.4 per cent, or 390.9-point, decline on Friday. Turnover dropped from Friday's 314.68 million shares to an estimated 180 million.

Investors believed that the yen could begin another surge as soon as markets in Europe and the United States opened after the Easter holiday, traders added.

Arab overseas funds put at over $900b

ABU DHABI (AFP) — Arab states have more than $900 billion investments abroad, nearly half of which are owned by governments, a United Arab Emirates (UAE) study said Monday.

Most of the assets are based in the United States and Europe and around $400 billion belong to governments, according to the study by Hassan Al Numan, chairman of the Federation of UAE Chambers of Commerce and Industry.

The Arab private sector controls around $220 billion while the rest are invested by banks in deposits, he said.

Mr. Numan gave no further details of those funds but bank estimates showed more than $400 billion of the Arab overseas assets are owned by Saudi Arabia and its five partners in the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC).

Most of the GCC funds are based in the U.S. and the European Union and invested in stocks, real estate and bank deposits.

Studies show major U.S. class divisions

NEW YORK (R) — Economic class differences in the United States are more pronounced than in any other industrialised nation, the New York Times reported Monday.

Citing economic and statistical research yet to be published, the Times reported that in 1989, last year for which statistics were available, the wealthiest one per cent of American households — with assets worth $2.3 million — owns "nearly 40 per cent of the nation's wealth."

The top 20 per cent of households, with assets of $180,000 or more, owns 80 per cent of America's wealth, the newspaper said.

In contrast, the richest one per cent of the British population owns about 18 per cent of the wealth.

On the lower end of the scale, the studies showed the lowest earning 20 per cent of households earn 5.7 per cent of America's after-tax income.

In Finland, the lowest 20 per cent earns 10.8 per cent of after-tax income.

In terms of income, the top 20 per cent of American households earn $55,000 or more and bring in 55 per cent of the after-tax income, the paper reported.

The author of two of the studies on wealth in Western countries is New York University Professor Edward Wolff, an economist who is to publish the papers in the next few months, the newspaper reported.

"We are the most unequal industrialised country in terms of income and wealth, and we're growing more unequal faster than the other industrialised countries," Dr. Wolff told the Times.

"It tells the political system toward those who have more resources," Margaret Weir of the Brookings Institution was quoted as saying.

Another scholar preparing studies for publication is Timothy Smeeding, director of the Luxembourg income study project.

Economic change leaves Russians below poverty line

MOSCOW (R) — Russia's rush to a market economy has brought colour to Moscow's shops and new cars to the streets, but millions of people live below the poverty line, their jobs and livelihoods at risk from economic change.

The head of the All-Russian Centre for Living Standards, an institute linked to the Labour Ministry, said Monday that 30 to 40 per cent of Russians earned less than the 249,000 ($50) a month viewed as the minimum subsistence level.

"Thirty to 40 per cent of the population live below the poverty line," Vyacheslav

Bobkov said by telephone.

But building a social safety net to help pensioners and the unemployed is low on the list of Russian priorities right now.

Ministers have plumped instead to stretch their budget funding a costly military campaign to crush breakaway Chechnya's independence bid. Poverty in Russia, the subject of a World Bank report to be released next month, is unlikely to go away.

"Poverty is something we are very concerned about, and so is the Russian government, possibly because it is an election year," said Hasso Moloney, operations manager at the World Bank's Moscow office.

"I think there is a realisation that the cost of transition is substantial. In the short to medium term, more and more people are going to become poor," he added.

World Bank figures show that Russia spends about 12.4 per cent of gross domestic product (GDP) on social security, although other Western economists put the figure at much more than that.

To fund a better system of social protection would take 14.9 per cent of GDP, the organisation says. "These are figures which are finance-able, and it is definitely something the government should be considering," Mr. Moloney said.

He said cash could come from redirecting subsidies, redistributing budgeted funds and raising retirement ages from the 50, 55 or 60 currently seen in Russia. "Low retirement ages like these are something a country like Russia can ill afford."

He said World Bank loans might help fund social security while Russia completed the transition from communism to capitalism, but Mr. Bobkov said he knew little of such plans.

"We prefer to rely on our own resources to solve the problem," he said.

Russia already has a social safety net inherited from a Soviet system which recognised the existence of neither inflation nor unemployment. It is struggling to cope.

Benefits, including homes, kindergartens and clinics, are frequently funded by firms rather than by the state. Other programmes may not reach the people who need them most.

Life below the poverty line may mean surviving on a pension under $9 a month — the new minimum approved by the State Duma parliament last week. A loaf of bread costs 20 cents.

Hawks nip Hornets 94-93 on last-second shot

CHARLOTTE, North-Carolina (AP) — Grant Long got a layup with three-tenths of a second left Sunday, giving the Atlanta Hawks a 94-93 National Basketball Association victory over the Charlotte Hornets.

Atlanta erased an 11-point lead in the third quarter with the help of Mookie Blaylock, who got 12 points in the period. His 3-pointer with one minute to play tied the score 92-92.

Charlotte missed five of six free throws down the stretch and clung to a 93-92 lead when the Hawks got the ball back. Blaylock dribbled past the time line to the right wing, where he passed to Long, who maneuvered between two defenders for the winning basket.

After three timeouts, the Hornets were reduced to a desperation 3-pointer by Mourning, whose attempt wouldn't have counted anyway.

Blaylock led Atlanta with 24 points on 9-for-21 shooting. Long finished with 18, Smith got 16, Tyrone Corbin scored 13 and Andrew Lang added 12 for the Hawks.

Spurs 112, Nuggets 109 OT: In Denver, David Robinson scored 42 points as the San Antonio Spurs moved one step closer to securing home court advantage throughout the playoffs with an overtime win over the Nuggets.

The Spurs led 110-107 when Avery Johnson fouled Denver's Greg Gränt on a 3-point attempt with 4.8 seconds left. But Grant missed the third foul shot.

Dikembe Mutombo grabbed the offensive rebound — his 20th rebound of the game — but couldn't convert a short shot over Robinson.

Robinson, who also had 14 rebounds, sealed the win with two free throws with 1.5 seconds left.

The Spurs, who moved two games ahead of Utah for the best record in the Western Conference and the league, overcame a 14-point first-half deficit but couldn't withstand a ferocious Denver rally in the fourth quarter.

Pacers 114, Timberwolves 75: In Indianapolis, the Pacers moved closer to their first NBA division championship with a trouncing of the Minnesota Timberwolves in their most lopsided victory this season.

The victory gave Indiana 50 wins in an NBA season for the first time since joining the league and put the Pacers 1 game ahead of Charlotte in the Central Division with three games to go. The Hornets lost ground by falling to Atlanta 94-93 Sunday.

The Pacers can clinch the division with any combination of two victories or two Charlotte losses.

Rik Smits led the Pacers with 22 points and Derrick McKey added 20.

Bulls 111, Knicks 90: In Chicago, Scottie Pippen scored 25 of his 29 points in the first half, making sure the Chicago Bulls wouldn't need magnificence from Michael Jordan to beat the New York Knicks.

Jordan, who scored 55 points in a 113-111 victory at New York two weeks ago, had 28 points on 8-of-19 shooting.

Pippen, who hadn't played since last Tuesday because of the flu, shot 11-of-13 in the first half, when Chicago took a 67-47 lead.

Toni Kukoc added 20 points and 10 assists for the Bulls, who have won nine of their last 10. Charles Smith scored 22 points and Patrick Ewing 17 for the Knicks, who had a five-game winning streak snapped.

Lakers 125, Mavericks 111: In Inglewood, California, Cedric Ceballos followed up a 40-point effort with 33 points as Los Angeles beat Dallas and snapped its four-game losing streak.

Q.1—Neither vulnerable, as South you hold:

Partner opens the bidding with one no trump. What do you respond?

A.—Since you have so many cards in the minors, partner's values rate to be in the majors, so don't bother looking for a minor-suit contract. Bid three no trump. At the table, South jumped to three diamonds. North raised and the final contract was five diamonds. The defenders cashed the ace-king of hearts and ace of spades and the same 10 tricks were available at no trump.

What do you bid now?

A.—Despite the fact that the bidding was opened in front of you, there could still be a slam your way. No spade raise will convey that information to partner. The correct way to show your strength is to start with a cue-bid of the enemy suit. Bid two hearts. Of course, you intend to raise to four spades at your next turn.

Your right-hand opponent opens the bidding with one club. What action do you take?

Honduras match abandoned, coach apologises after 7-1 loss to Netherlands

DOHA (AP) — The coach of the Honduras football team made a public apology here Sunday after his side had four men sent off during their World Youth Championship match against the Netherlands.

Honduras lost the match 7-1. The game was abandoned after 77 minutes with the Central Americans left with just six players on the field. As well as the four men dismissed by the Japanese referee, Masayoshi Okada, they also had Luis Oseguera stretched off.

At that time of the game, they had also used their three permitted substitutes. The rules of the sport say that a team has to have at least seven players on the pitch. If not, the game must be abandoned.

"I apologise to the Dutch team and the people here for what happened tonight," said Honduras coach Luis Camargo.

"I can assure you that the four will severely be punished by the football federation. We are a small nation and do not have the experience of playing in such a big event," Camargo said.

Alex Bailey was the first player ordered off in the 17th minute followed by Orvin Cabrera (45), Hector Rodriguez (70) and Luis Lagos (73).

They also had three other players booked. Honduras had skipper Fabio Ulloa sent off in their opening match against Portugal on Friday.

The Dutch goals came from Mendel Witzenhausen (9, 23 and 74 minutes), Nordin Wooter (3 and 44), Robert Gehring (65) and Wilfred Bouma (76).

Honduras scored their goal from the penalty spot through Oseguera in the 48th minute. In other matches Sunday, Cameroon defeated Australia 3-2; Syria beat Qatar 1-0 while Chile and Burundi drew 1-1.

Mark Viduka gave Australia the lead after 10 minutes but Cameroon hit back through Ndiefi McDonald (51 and 65) to lead 2-1.

The Australians levelled in 70 minutes through Viduka but Mahop Ntamag Mahop gave Cameroon the three points in the dying seconds. Syria beat Qatar 1-0 with a goal from Nihad Boshli in the 53rd minute. The home-side had Rashid Al-Muhazza and captain Mohammed Salem sent off.

Burundi drew 1-1 with Chile. Chile's goal came from Sebastian Rozental after 13 minutes. Burundi's reply came from Blaise Butumungu seven minutes from the end.

The number of players sent off in the competition has now reached fifteen.

Monday's matches see Brazil play Russia, Germany meet Costa Rica, Portugal play Argentina while Japan take on Spain.

Pitchers finally getting ready for the real thing

The Associated Press BARRY BONDS and Ken Griffey Jr. gave everyone a glimpse of what they saw last season.

Orel Hershisier, John Burkett and Pete Harnisch gave their new teams a peek at the kind of pitching they might see this season.

And Jose Canseco provided a new sight — walking a picket line with locked-out umpires before Boston played Texas on Sunday night.

"I don't know how much it's going to affect their negotiations," Canseco said. "I would love to have an impact."

Eight umpires held informational picketing, wearing signs that said "scabs go home" and handing out leaflets. Canseco put a sign around his neck, too, before going back inside to play for the Red Sox.

"It goes to show you right there that one of the prime players in the game is standing behind us," Al Umpire John Hirschbeck said.

Bonds and Griffey both hit their third home runs of the spring.

Bonds, who has played in four exhibition games for San Francisco, hit a 470-foot shot against the Chicago Cubs. He hit 37 homers last year in the strike-shortened season.

Griffey, who has played in only three spring games, hit an opposite-field drive. He led "The Alwith 40 home runs last year.

"All three of his home runs have been hit to left field, and that's a good sign because it shows he's going with the pitch," Mariners manager Lou Piniella said.

Hershisier, in his first game with someone other than Los Angeles, looked good for two innings for the Cleveland Indians.

"Same thing in an Indians uniform as a Dodgers uniform," he said. "It's still 60 feet, 6 inches to the plate, still 90 feet to first. Still playing with a hunch of great guys."

Hershisier, 36, signed as a free agent this month. Facing the Kansas City Royals, he gave up an unearned run on three hits.

"They hit a lot of choppers, a lot of ground balls. That told me my hall was reacting properly," he said.

"If I'm getting the movement and the velocity is there naturally, that's all I can hope for."

Burkett, traded by San Francisco to Texas in the offseason and later a signed by the Florida Marlins, pitched four innings. He allowed one run and struck out three.

Harnisch, traded by Houston to the New York Mets in the offseason, didn't have such a stellar pitching line, giving two runs on three hits Fla., to the Easter game in west Palm Beach, and that angered Atlanta general manager John Schuerholz.

"I think it is hush," he said. "There are regulations that clearly specify how many regulars each team has to bring on road games in the spring. The Yankees don't have their own set of rules, but they must have felt like they did today."

For years, spring training guidelines have stated that visiting clubs must have four usual starters, not including the pitcher. The regulation was put into effect to ensure that fans who pay for a major league exhibition — not a "B" game or split-squad game — see top players.

Fernandez, usually a shortstop, batted ninth as the designated hitter. As part of revamped rules for the shortened spring training, all teams are being allowed to use the DH when they play at NL parks.

John Smoltz, in his first appearance since July 31, pitched two scoreless innings

NFL legend ready to retire

SAN FRANCISCO (AFP) — Joe Montana's retirement, expected here Tuesday, concludes at age 38 what many consider the greatest career in American football history.

Montana led the San Francisco 49ers to four Super Bowl titles, became the only three-time Most Valuable Player of the National Football League's championship game and became the standard to which all others are compared.

"You have to consider him the greatest quarterback who ever played the game because he could do everything," said former 49ers coach Bill Walsh, who guided three Super Bowl championship teams with Montana directing the offense.

Montana and receiver Jerry Rice became one of the most potent combinations in the sport's history playing together for the 49ers. Montana's never-say-die attitude created some of the NFL's most memorable moments of the 1980s.

His first starring moment is recalled simply as "The Catch" and has been shown on U.S. television often enough to be part of a collective memory for all NFL fans.

The play came in the 1982 NFL semi-finals against Dallas. The 49ers trailed by six points with only 51 seconds remaining. Montana was forced to hackpedal to his right under the rush of three Cowboy defenders.

Montana lofted a desperate pass high into the back of the end zone and Dwight Clark grabbed it for the winning touchdown. The 49ers beat Cincinnati for the Super Bowl crown that year and did so again seven years later on what fans call "The Drive."

The 49ers trailed by three points with 3:23 remaining and were 92 yards from the Bengals' end zone when Montana guided a 49er march.

Bad weather postpones America's Cup

SAN DIEGO (AFP) — An Alaskan storm blew through here Sunday, bringing with it 30-knot wind gusts and four-metre seas that postponed America's Cup yacht racing on the challenger and defender courses to Monday.

Looking at the flags outside the Australia compound, Aussie Helmsman Rod Davis had to agree with the decision. Didn't want to, but had to.

"As much as it hurts us, the race committee made the right call," Davis said. "But, realistically, losing today's race is a double whammy for us."

The cancellation not only killed a race in favourable strong winds, but also cost one Australia a much needed practice day.

One Australia proved Team New Zealand was beatable on Saturday. Sailing a near-perfect race, one Australia led Team Zealand throughout the six-leg, 28.8-kilometre race and hit the finish line a full 15 seconds before the Kiwis.

Graf wins 4th title of year

HOUSTON (Agencies) — World number one Steffi Graf cruised past first-time WTA finalist Asa Carlsson of Sweden 6-1, 6-1, in 68 minutes Sunday, remaining unbeaten in 1995 and winning the $300,000 Houston Championship.

Graf rose to 18-0 this year and collected 79,000 dollars for her fourth crown of 1995, her first on clay. The German star won earlier titles at Key Biscayne, Delray Beach and Paris and has not lost a set so far this year.

"I see some thing I can work on," Graf said. "But overall, I haven't had too many troubles this week. I could concentrate better. But I knew what I had to do to win the points and I did that."

Graf lost only 12 games in her eight sets here, dropping no more than two games to any set of her clay season debut. She has won $442,500 so far this year, taking her career earnings above $15 million dollars.

Carlsson, who takes away $35,000, was broken twice in losing the first four games of the final set. She held in the fifth game but Graf held and then added one final service break to capture the match. "She played too good," Carlsson said. "I tried my best. But she just played every point great. I definitely got a lesson. She has a lot of experience. It was exciting because she's number one and this is the first time I played her."

Graf overpowered a weak field here that was reduced even more when second seed Magdalena Maleeva and third seed Mary Joe Fernandez withdrew before their first matches.

Fourth seed Iva Majoli and fifth seed Zina Garrison-Jackson were ousted in their openers and Graf herself eliminated sixth seed Sabine Hack 6-2, 6-2, in the semi-final.

Back strain puts Agassi out

World number one Andre Agassi pulled out of the Hong Kong Open here as doctors advised him to take two weeks rest while undergoing treatment for lower back strain.

Agassi began complaining of back trouble in the Davis Cup tie against Italy three weeks ago in Palermo, Sicily.

The pain flared up during his opening match in the Japan Open in Tokyo last week — which he lost to Sunday's final to U.S. champion Jim Courier.

"I'll be taking massage and ultrasound treatment and resting for two weeks," said Agassi, the U.S. and Australian Open holder, before leaving Tokyo Monday for the West Coast of the United States.

"I have my back looked at closer at home. Everyone around me is confident that rest is a key factor for me now."

Agassi, twice a finalist in the French Open, does not want to compromise his chances of finally winning the clay court Grand Slam event, which begins May 29 at Roland Garros in Paris.

Agassi said he hopes to play on clay from May 1 in Atlanta, before traveling to Hamburg for more seasoning on the surface before the start of the French event.

Hoog Kong Open organizers here are now counting on Centre Court, police and bodyguards kept a crowd of his young fans at bay.

Lower-ranked seeds went into action on Monday. Seventh seeded Dutchman Jan Siemerink beat Australian Wally Masur 6-4, 6-4, and eighth-seeded Martin Damm of the Czech Republic ousted Alexander Mironov of Germany in a tiebreak battle, 7-6 (7/3), 7-6 (12/10).

Master wins again on clay

Austria's Thomas Muster won his 19th consecutive final on clay Sunday, running over Sweden's Magnus Larsson 6-2, 6-1, 6-4 in the Conde de Godo ATP tournament.

Depleted Juventus, Dortmund resume hostilities

PARIS (AFP) — Treble-chasing Juventus have three players sidelined and Borussia Dortmund must suffer three player suspensions, three ruled out by injury and two doubtful starters for Tuesday's UEFA Cup semi-final.

Keeper Angelo Peruzzi and striker Gianluca Vialli are injured, and sweeper Moreno Torricelli is suspended for Juventus.

Juventus, who beat Lazio 2-1 (3-1 on aggregate) in midweek to put them into the Italian Cup final, travel to Dortmund with the tie delicately balanced at 2-2.

Parma, with a 2-1 advantage, host Bayer Leverkusen in the night's other semi-final.

A Roberto Baggio double earned Juventus a 2-1 win against Reggiana on Saturday to move 11 points clear of second-placed Parma in the Italian championship.

Baggio, who was out for more than three months this season with a knee injury, said: "I have certainly had a difficult period, but it is now all behind me."

Dortmund, ahead of Werder Bremen by one point in the Bundesliga, will have to field almost a reserve side as their first string is decimated by suspension and injury.

In the first leg, French referee Marc Batta waved eight yellow cards — five for Dortmund.

Three of Dortmund's key players — internationals Andreas Moller, Matthias Sammer, and Karlheinz Rie-over Lazio. Martin Kree is also out, and Stefan Reuter and Ibrahim Tanko are doubtful, spelling the necessity of bringing in untried reserves.

Dortmund, trying to forget their 6-1 thrashing on aggregate in the UEFA Cup final two years ago, must fear a similar crushing loss.

In the other semi-final, Bayer Leverkusen have sacked their coach since the 2-1 loss in Germany against Parma in the first match.

Erich Ribbeck was hired as coach in place of Slav Dragoslav Stankovic.

General manager Rainer Calmund explained: "The differences between Stankovic and the team could not be patched up. We had to react."

Leverkusen, the 1988 UEFA Cup champions, warmed up with a 1-0 win against Bayer Uerdingen on Thursday thanks to a Rudi Voeller penalty.

Antonio Benarrivo is suspended for Parma, the 1992/93 Cup Winners Cup champions, meaning coach Nevio Scala will have to reshuffle his defensive line.

Parma, 11 points behind Juventus and almost certainly out of the Italian title race, still have a chance to show Juventus who is boss in this UEFA Cup.

In a further power struggle, this event is a battle between Germany and Italy for European supremacy.

Following Italian clubs' financial problems, many German stars have returned home. Italian presidents now look to cheaper markets, such as Portugal, for foreign replacements.

Eintracht Frankfurt vice-president Bernd Holzenbein, who won the World Cup as a player in 1974, believes a wind of change is in the air.

"The Bundesliga is beginning to compete on an equal basis with the Serie A," he said.

The winner of the Leverkusen/Parma tie hosts the first leg of the final on May 3, with the return on May 17.

Dortmund issued a plea to UEFA, but were told: "You can't appeal against yellow cards."

Swiss striker Stephane Chapuisat and Deomark's Flemming Povlsen are already out through injury to add to the problems of Dortmund coach Ottmar Hitzfeld.

Chapuisat, 25, faces surgery after tearing knee ligaments in training, just two days after scoring one goal and creating another in their 2-0 quarter-final, second leg win loss in Germany against Parma in the first match.

Czechs happy with Fed Cup draw

LA MANGA, Spain (AFP) — Jana Novotna and Helena Sukova of the Czech Republic will be happy with the draw at this year's Fed Cup qualifying event here, grouping them with Poland, Britain and Slovenia. In world ranking terms, they are already assured of success in the group, leaving the other three nations to scrap among themselves for the vital second place in Group-A and a place in the last eight.

Group-B is headed by Russia and though Elena Likhovtseva and Eleonora Makarova, ranked 46 and 47 respectively, are out-ranked by Georgia's Leila Meskhi (35), Russia should come safely through with neighbours Georgia at the expense of Hungary and the Ukraine. Martina Hingis, 14, who leads Switzerland's challenge, will find the going tough in Group-C where the favourites are Belarus leaving the second place to be contested between Finland and Latvia. Group-D offers the tightest competition. Belgium's Dominique Monami and Laurence Courtis will be staying off a strong challenge from Croatia and Romania while Israel will be battling to stave relegation into the lower qualifying division.

58 banned from soccer

KUALA LUMPUR (AP) — Fifty-eight soccer players who confessed to fixing matches in national league have been banned from playing anywhere in the world for one to four years. The Football Association of Malaysia said Monday two players will be suspended for four years, 12 for three years, 10 for 2½ years, 19 for two years, eight for 1½ years and seven for one year. The punished players also are being investigated by police since August, but no charges have been filed yet. The players are accused of taking bribes from bookmakers of fix results of matches in the 16-team premier league. One player was reported to have been paid as much as 40,000 ringgit ($16,000) to let in a goal.

Gaudino faxes court appearance

MANNHEIM, Germany (AFP) — Manchester City's German international Maurizio Gaudino is expected to appear in court here soon after Easter to answer charges of car theft. Before his move to England from Eintracht Frankfurt, Gaudino was questioned by police for 24-hours last December in connection with a ring of car thieves who exported stolen German vehicles. Sunday's Frankfurter Allgemeine Sonntagszeitung quoted prosecutor Jochem Seiler as saying, "a decision on his indictment will be taken after Easter." Police allege the midfielder player had been a member of the ring for three years.

The result put Botafogo three points ahead of Flamengo at the top of the final stage of the Rio de Janeiro championship.

Children in Cantona class

MANCHESTER (AFP) — Amid continuing uncertainty about his future at Manchester United, Eric Cantona will start his programme of 120 hours of community service teaching football skills to children from the Salford area of Manchester on Tuesday. A spokeswoman at Manchester United's Old Trafford ground confirmed on Monday the coaching was going ahead but declined to give further details. Cantona was given the community service order on March 23 when he won his appeal against a two-week jail sentence for assaulting a Crystal Palace fan.

Cantona has also been suspended from all football until September 30 by the Football Association and fined a total of 30,000 pounds for assaulting the allegedly abusive fan during United's match at Selhurst Park in late January.

Maradona absent for Racing win

BUENOS AIRES (R) — Racing Club achieved an unexpected Argentine championship win at Boca Juniors at the weekend — but their coach Diego Maradona was absent. Racing won 1-0 to record their first victory in Boca's La Bombonera Stadium since 1975 and end their opponent's unbeaten seven-match run. Maradona, who has been given a 20-day leave by Racing, was at home as his side achieved their best result since he and Carlos Fren took over as joint coaches at the start of the year.

6 points

behind

Real Madrid

MADRID (AP) — Deportivo de la Coruna kept its slim hopes alive for a Spanish league title with a 3-1 win Sunday over Real Sociedad to stay within six points of league-leading Real Madrid with nine rounds to play.

Deportivo, second last season and third the year before, took a 1-0 lead midway through the first half on a Francisco "Fran" Gonzalez Perez goal.

Real Sociedad's Imanol Alguacil tied the match in the 49th, but Fran struck again in the 54th minute to make it 2-1 and Brazilian international Bebeto scored his 12th of the season in the 82nd to clinch the victory.

Real Madrid, a 2-0 winner Saturday at archrival Atletico de Madrid, has 44 points to 38 for Deportivo. Chilean Ivan Zamorano scored both for Real Madrid to increase his league-leading goal total to 24.

Four-time defending champion Barcelona was hapless in a scoreless draw Sunday at Oviedo to hold third place with 36 points.

In other games: Sevilla 1, Valladolid 0; Valencia 2, Betis 1; Compostela 0, Alhacete 0; Racing de Santander 0, Sporting de Gijon 0; Tenerife 3, Celta 0; Espanyol 3, Athletic de Bilbao 1; Zaragoza 3, Logrones 0.

In Seville, Juan "Juanito" Francisco Rodriguez scored in the 68th minute to give Sevilla the victory.

In Valencia, Raul Ibanez gave the winners a 1-0 lead in the 9th minute and Antonio Poyatos got the clincher in the 82nd. Betis threatened with a penalty in the 88th minute by Bosnian Hristo Vidakovic.

In Tenerife, Luis Miguel Ramis scored in the first half, Juan Antonio Pizzi scored his 13th of the season in the 69th, and Ignacio Conte added the final in the 77th.

In Barcelona, Ernesto Valverde scored in the 14th for a 1-0 athletic lead, but Espanyol's Francisco Lopez Alfaro tied it in the final minute of first half. Jose Rojo Martin scored the winner for Espanyol on a header in the 53rd, and Jordi Lardiu got an insurance goal one minute later.

In Zaragoza on Saturday Javier Aguado scored in the 18th, Gustavo Poyet struck in the 40th and Juan Eduardo Esnaider finished off the scoring in the 77th minute in a 3-0 victory over last-place Logrones.

Zaragoza avoided an upset as it looked ahead to Thursday's Cup Winners Cup semi-final, second-leg match at English side Chelsea.

Qadhafi ready for war over Haj flights

TRIPOLI (Agencies) — Libyan leader Muammar Qadhafi has said his country was ready to fight to enable Libyans to fly directly to Saudi Arabia for pilgrimage to Mecca.

"They (the Christians) launched a crusade when they accused Muslims of preventing them from reaching Jerusalem. We are ready for a war to reach Mecca," Colonel Qadhafi told Reuters in an interview on Sunday night.

He added that flights taking Libyans for pilgrimage to Islam's holiest shrine must be seen as exempt from a U.N. Security Council air embargo imposed on his country over the Lockerbie affair.

The ban on flights to and from Libya is part of sanctions, including arms sales, imposed in 1992 after Tripoli refused to hand over two Libyans wanted in connection with the 1988 bombing of Pan-Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in which 270 people died.

In Cairo, Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Musa said his country was trying to find a way to allow Libyan pilgrims to fly to Saudi Arabia for Haj.

"There are ongoing contacts between Egypt, Libya and a number of other countries to see the best way to facilitate the trip of the Libyan pilgrims," Mr. Musa told reporters.

The pilgrimage season is in early May.

Although the United Nations could issue a waiver for the pilgrimage, Libya has not requested one, U.N. officials say.

If Col. Qadhafi made good on his threat, it would put neighbouring countries in a difficult position because they would find it politically impossible to block religious flights.

Libyan planes would have to fly over Egypt or Sudan to get to Saudi Arabia.

Egyptian Information Minister Safwat Al Sherif, a close adviser of President Hosni Mubarak, travelled to Libya last week to discuss the issue with Col. Qadhafi.

The weekly Al Arabi newspaper reported Monday that Mr. Sherif suggested as a compromise that the pilgrims use foreign airlines from Egypt, Algeria or Holland, but said Col. Qadhafi turned down the idea.

Tripoli-based Arab diplomats said they expected the flights to start on Tuesday from Tripoli and Benghazi airports.

They said Egyptian planes would be used to fly the pilgrims to Jeddah in Saudi Arabia because Libyan airlines had been poorly maintained since the flight ban was imposed.

Since 1992, Libyan pilgrims have flown there from other countries after leaving Libya by land or sea. As a political statement, some Libyan pilgrims took a camel train through Egypt in 1994 and others went to Jerusalem in 1993.

Col. Qadhafi told Reuters his country had run out of patience on the direct flights issue after three years of the ban.

"We gave them (Security Council members) an opportunity when our pilgrims went to Jerusalem and by camels, where we suffered and some pilgrims died en route, but that did not move their conscience. We are forced now to go to the pilgrimage and will do it each year directly through Libyan airspace whatever the price," Col. Qadhafi said.

Wearing flowing, traditional Libyan robes and speaking on the green of the Aziza Barracks in Tripoli, Col. Qadhafi said he sees the pilgrims' flights as an exception which does not mean that Libya intends to violate the Security Council ban.

"We do not want to violate the resolutions of the so-called Security Council, nor do we demand that any state violate them, but the pilgrimage is another question," Col. Qadhafi said before recalling the Crusades' historical precedent.

"Mecca is a separate affair which has nothing to do with the embargo or the Security Council resolutions," he added.

Mr. Qadhafi at the end of March said that pilgrims would be transported by the Libyan national airline and that Tripoli had already handed to Saudi Arabia the flight schedules.

Saudi Arabia Interior Minister Prince Nayef Ben Abdul Aziz, reacting to the Libyan announcement, said earlier this month Saudi Arabia would receive any pilgrim who had proper documents, "no matter what means be used to arrive in."

"We are not going to Saudi Arabia, we are going to God's house (in Mecca)," Col. Qadhafi said when asked what was the final Saudi decision.

Col. Qadhafi on Monday warned African nationals working in the country could starve to death because of the U.N. sanctions, the official agency JANA reported.

"The sanctions have affected our African brothers, they are left without job opportunities. They could face a difficult situation threatened by starvation and death," he said.

Highlighting that all African states north of the Equator have nationals working in Libya, he urged the countries to "find a solution to avoid a catastrophe for these people."

Col. Qadhafi was talking to labour ministers gathered in Tripoli to attend the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) labour committee meeting to open on Tuesday.

He also voiced fears that jobless Africans faced with economic hardship in their own countries could try to emigrate illegally to Europe.

Foreign Minister Omar Al Muntasser said last month that if the U.N. sanctions continue, Tripoli could be forced to expel its 2.5 million foreign workers.

Appointment of city managers does not aim at weakening elected mayors — Thuheirat

By Sa'eda Kilani
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — The recent government decision to appoint city managers in governorate centres and district headquarters ahead of municipal elections is not intended to weaken the powers of elected mayors, according to Minister of Municipal and Rural Affairs and the Environment Nader Thuheirat.

If anything, said Mr. Thuheirat, the appointment of city managers would help reduce the workload of mayors.

At least one former mayor, Yasser Omari of Zarqa, criticised the government decision saying there was a "question mark" over the move.

He sought to support his argument by pointing out that the decision to appoint city managers came only two months before the July 11 municipal elections. Mr. Omari said the government should have waited until the municipal elections.

In an interview with the Jordan Times, Mr. Thuheirat, who is also a member of the Lower House of Parliament, said the appointment of municipal directors was purely an "executive" decision.

"Municipal directors are not appointed to compete with mayors," he said. "They are there to help mayors."

According to the Cabinet decision, which was taken on Saturday in line with a recommendation by Mr. Thuheirat, the main responsibilities of the city managers include implementation of decisions taken by municipal councils and preparation of municipal budgets.

The city manager, who can attend municipal council meeting without voting power, is also in charge of supervising municipal revenue collection.

The Cabinet decision covers the governorate headquarters of Salt, Irbid, Jerash, Ajloun, Mafrak, Ma'an, Karak, Tafileh, Aqaba and Madaba as well as the district centres of Ramtha, Sama Rousan, Deir Abi Saeed, Deir Alla, Northern Shuneh and Southern Shuneh. It also covers the municipalities of Russeifeh and Zarqa.

Mr. Omari, whose municipal council was dissolved last September and replaced by a government-appointed committee, said: "Even if the decision was in the interests of the municipalities, the government should have waited until the municipal elections."

Mr. Omari noted that once the municipal councils are elected, the city manager would be appointed by the elected mayor, vice-mayor and the administrative governor.

Under the new law, all municipal councils were dissolved pending new elections and government-appointed councils are now running the municipalities. As such, the government is also in charge of appointing the city managers.

Mr. Omari, however, welcomed the holding of all municipal council elections on one day throughout the Kingdom as "a very positive step."

"Reducing the number of municipal councils from 600 and plus to 259 is also a great achievement," he said.

At the same time, he said, "despite the fact that appointing city managers was a standing request of municipal councils, why did the government not wait until the elections were held?"

Mr. Thuheirat countered by pointing out that the 1983 law on municipalities provided for the appointment of city managers, but had never been applied before. He said he did not see any reason why it should not be applied now.

"Instead of asking why we are applying the law now, we should ask why it was not applied earlier," he asserted.

The minister, a former mayor of northern Shuneh, said the mayorship was one difficult job that entailed enormous social and administrative responsibilities. He said an assistant to the mayor is necessary.

"The mayor has enormous responsibilities and has many public duties," said Mr. Thuheirat. "Even preparing the budget at a time when the population is growing is a big task."

Israeli opposition stages W. Bank-Netanya march

BEIT LID JUNCTION (Agencies) — Thousands of Israelis marched Monday from the West Bank to the Mediterranean Sea, protesting plans to turn over more land to the Palestinians.

The march — across the narrowest part of Israel within its pre-1967 borders — was meant to illustrate the country's vulnerability if the government cedes control of the West Bank to the Palestinians, as outlined in the Israel-Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) accord.

It is 16 kilometres from the Israeli checkpoint outside the West Bank town of Tulkarm, where the march began, to the Mediterranean coast at Netanya.

"It's committing suicide to give it back," said right-wing opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu, as he led about 6,000 people who covered that distance in less than two hours.

Marchers carried Israeli flags, banners and campaign posters for the right-wing Likud and the National Religious Party and chanted "I don't want to be the next victim."

Sixty-five Israelis have been killed since October in attacks by militants trying to scuttle ongoing Israel-PLO peace talks.

Israel and the PLO are holding talks on extending the autonomy established 11 months ago in the Gaza Strip and Jericho to the rest of the West Bank. But support for the deal among Israelis is being sapped by the continuing violence.

"This is a popular demonstration of growing public sentiment against continuation of a false peace with the Palestinians," said Daniel Diker, who helped organise the march.

Deputies accuse Kuwait ministry of wasting funds

KUWAIT (AP) — A parliamentary sub-committee has accused the Defence Ministry of wasting public funds, protecting wrongdoers and leading Kuwait towards another catastrophe, according to a report published Monday.

The Defence Ministry's expense programme are not geared towards supporting the efficiency of the Kuwaiti military... but towards wasting public money without showing any results on the ground," said the report, published in the independent Al Qabas daily.

The sub-committee was set up in May 1993 to investigate alleged kickbacks on weapons purchases made after Kuwait was liberated in February 1991 after a seven-month Iraqi occupation.

It is part of a committee that the emirate's opposition-dominated parliament set up in December 1992 to investigate the events that led up to Iraq's August 1990 invasion.

The report said the Defence Ministry has purchased large amounts of equipment and spare parts that were either not needed or have not been used.

It said, for example, that propeller-driven Shorts Tucano aircraft, used as trainers and for counter-insurgency operations, and

Some protesters carried a paper mache mannequin, labelled with a sign that read "Three hours for a suicide bomber on foot."

"This area's so short — there's no way we can give it up," said Stephanie Haimowitz of Kfar Sava. "If a two-year-old and a four-year-old can walk it, then any Arab can easily get across."

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin says he opposes a total withdrawal from the West Bank. But the September 1993 Israel-PLO accord calls for autonomy in all of the West Bank during a five-year interim stage.

Critics fear that in talks on the area's final status, the PLO will press for a state in all the territory that was autonomous.

Israel and the PLO are holding talks on extending the autonomy established 11 months ago in the Gaza Strip and Jericho to the rest of the West Bank. But support for the deal among Israelis is being sapped by the continuing violence.

"This is a popular demonstration of growing public sentiment against continuation of a false peace with the Palestinians," said Daniel Diker, who helped organise the march.

Most of those held are Shiites, Amnesty said. Exiled opposition groups said that more than 3,000 people had been arrested in sporadic violence which has flared in the emirate since December.

Local newspapers on Monday quoted the Interior Ministry official as saying the 120 were freed after authorities completed "investigations into their involvement in recent rioting and subversive activities."

He did not give names or say when they were freed.

At least 10 civilians and three policemen have been killed in the protests demanding the release of political detainees and the restoration of parliament, dissolved in 1975.

Bahrain's Emir, Sheikh Isa Bin Salman Al Khalifa, on Sunday met Bahraini dignitaries "who voiced their readiness to do all they could to maintain the stability, security and progress of Bahrain," the official Gulf News Agency said.

Sheikh Isa "expressed appreciation for their sincere efforts and that the people of Bahrain were and would remain as one family."

Interior ministers of the Gulf Cooperation Council grouping Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar, Oman and the United Arab Emirates were due to hold an extraordinary meeting in Bahrain on Tuesday, the agency said, without giving further details.

The report named several officials, but Al Qabas did not publish the names for legal reasons.

"If the government does not solve these problems, they will lead the country to an impasse in the near future," the report concluded.

Bahrain frees 120 held in wave of unrest

MANAMA (Agencies) — Bahrain on Monday announced it had released 120 people arrested in a wave of unrest which has swept the Gulf archipelago in the past months, local papers reported.

Bahrain has released 120 Bahraini detainees after completing the investigation into their involvement in recent violent subversive activities," an Interior Ministry official said in the reports.

Violent clashes erupted in early December after the arrest of Shiite Muslim cleric Sheikh Ali Salman who had called for political reforms and the restoration of parliament suspended in 1975.

He was later deported and fled to London where he has requested political asylum.

The human rights group Amnesty International said in a report released at the end of March that it had the names of 700 people detained in the emirate since December, but believed many more were being held.

Bullying victim hangs himself in Japan

TOKYO (AFP) — A 13-year-old Japanese schoolboy hanged himself in western Japan after allegedly being bullied, the latest victim of a series of school violence cases, police said Monday.

The boy, whose name was not disclosed, hanged himself with electric cable at his home Sunday, leaving a note saying that he was bullied by his classmates and senior students at Buzen municipal Suda Junior High School in Fukuoka. According to the note, the boy was beaten by nine other students, police said. School officials said they had not noticed that the student was bullied, adding that a local school board and police had separately launched an investigation into the case.

The Justice Ministry said in a report released Sunday that 36.1 per cent of junior high school students declare they have been bullied and a third of them claim to have endured the ill-treatment without any protest. The survey was conducted last year, covering 13,000 students at 119 schools across the nation.

The death last November of Kiyotaru Okochi, who killed himself after his classmates tormented $11,000 from him, triggered a wave of child suicides in connection with school bullying.

Turkish Consulate attacked

STOCKHOLM (Agencies) — Turkey's consulate in the southern Swedish town of Malmö was damaged overnight by unknown attackers who smashed windows and hurled paint inside, the Swedish news agency TT reported on Monday.

TT said police found no clue as to whether the attack was politically motivated.

Last month a Turkish government travel bureau in Stockholm was set alight but police put out the fire before serious damage occurred.

Sweden has a large Turkish immigrant population and it was not known if the attacks were the work of racists or anti-government activists within the Turkish and Kurdish communities.

Petrol bombs were thrown at two Turkish social clubs in southern Germany Sunday night, causing heavy damage to one of them, police said.

They said they suspected Turkish extremists of carrying out the attacks in the towns of Backnang and Ditzingen. No one was hurt.

Six Turks have been arrested in connection with petrol bomb attacks on five Turkish banks in the western city of Cologne on Saturday. Police said some of them had a record of activism for the banned Turkish militant left-wing group Dev Sol.

Turkish premises in Germany have been the target of several waves of attacks in the last two years.

In Sunday's attack, the headquarters of a Turkish sports association burned down in Backnang, near Stuttgart, police said.

A firebomb was hurled through a window of the two-storey building, which caught fire.

NEWS IN BRIEF

Qatar, PNA sign aviation accord

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM (R) — The Palestinian National Authority (PNA) and Qatar have signed an aviation agreement that would allow two Gulf Arab airlines to fly to Gaza and Jericho once the self-rule areas have built airports, a PNA official said on Monday. "Qatari and Gulf airlines will fly to Palestinian airports in self-rule areas, and the Palestinian airlines will fly to Qatar's airports," Fayeze Zeydan, head of the Palestinian civil aviation department, said in a news release. Mr. Zeydan, who signed the accord last week in Qatar, said the Qatari Airlines and Gulf Air were the first carriers in the world to sign an agreement with the PNA.

French 'peace convoy' brings aid to Gaza

RAFAH (AFP) — A "peace convoy" drove into the Gaza Strip on Monday bringing 100 tonnes of aid for the Palestinians from France. A dozen trucks draped in French and Palestinian flags crossed the border from Egypt at Rafah after two hours of checks by Israeli authorities. The French aid group Equilibre organised the convoy carrying goods ranging from school and sports equipment to wheelchairs, hospital beds and three mobile dental surgeries. Palestinian police escorted the trucks, a bus and a jeep from the border towards an official welcoming ceremony in Gaza City to be attended by Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's wife Suha. The French government backed the convoy which left Paris on April 2.

Qatar cancels Peres visit

TEL AVIV (AFP) — Qatar has called off the first visit to the Gulf state by Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres after news of the trip was leaked in the press, Israel radio reported on Monday. A foreign ministry spokesman refused to comment and underlined that no official announcement had been made about such a visit. Mr. Peres said on April 9 that he would shortly travel to two Gulf states, but did not name them. A foreign ministry official, who refused to be named, had said Qatar and Oman were the likely destinations. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin paid an unprecedented visit to Oman last December, but Israel's diplomatic breakthrough in the Arab World has since gone on hold as the peace process has bogged down.

Israeli army probes sex film

TEL AVIV (AFP) — The Israeli army has launched an inquiry after a soldier secretly filmed a no-bolds barred sex session with a female soldier and showed it to all the unit. "The military police are taking this affair very seriously and have opened an investigation," an army spokesman said. The girl made an official complaint alleging that an officer had demanded the film from her male colleague as the price for weekend leave from a base in Israel. The sex session took place in 1994, but she only found out recently that it had been filmed.

Washington to return $700m in hardware — Pakistan

ISLAMABAD (AP) — The United States will return about $700 million worth of military hardware to Pakistan, nearly five years after it was impounded, Foreign Minister Sardar Asif Ali said Monday.

Washington impounded the equipment, which included several Cobra helicopters, in 1990, when U.S. aid to Pakistan was dropped to protest its nuclear weapons programme.

The equipment was in the U.S. for repairs.

Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto secured Washington's promise to return the equipment during a 10-day visit to the U.S. which ended last week.

Ms. Bhutto, in meeting with U.S. senators, congressmen and President Bill Clinton, lobbied strongly for an end to sanctions against Pakistan, imposed under a U.S. law known as the Pressler Amendment. The law singles out Pakistan for punishment for its nuclear programme.

Pakistan argues that the law ignores the nuclear programme in neighbouring India, which exploded a nuclear device in 1974.

Pakistan maintains that its nuclear programme is necessary to counter India's. The South Asian neighbours have gone to war three times.
